PR class learns from hands-on experience

By Veronika Novoselova
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Students from a public relations campaigns class had an unusual end to their semester. Members of the class gathered Monday in Auntie Mae's Parlor in Aggieville to have lunch and discuss the results of an entire semester's worth of work.

The campaigns class is led by assistant professor of journalism and mass communications Nancy Muturi, who has several years of international experience with non-profit organizations. Her research interests are Gender and Health communications with special interests in HIV/AIDS and women's reproductive health. Her research focus is in Africa, the Caribbean and among minority populations in the United States.

Muturi shared her knowledge with students, who were creating a PR campaign for the Regional AIDS Project to raise awareness about HIV/AIDS in Riley and Geary counties. There are 35 people in Muturi's class, and 23 of them are involved in the project.

"PR is all about communication, education and management," Muturi said. "HIV/AIDS is a big issue; it's affecting everybody. Everyone can get HIV - from babies to old people. There is a need to spread information in the society," Muturi said.

Students learned all the methods of creating a campaign, from research and planning, to putting material together and effectively and systematically delivering the information to the public.

"Our class is acting like a PR firm. We created all the campaign's materials: Brochures, fliers, public service announcements and press releases. And today is our official lunch to present the project," said Danielle English, senior in mass communications.

As in a real organization or company, the class had two class leaders who served as "bosses." One of the class leaders, Lucretia Helms, senior in mass communications, said

Director's drive strengthens students, Scholars Program

By Deborah Muhwezi
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Developing Scholars Program's administrative director, Anita Cortez, has decided to push forward no matter what obstacles she might face.

"One runs into walls occasionally, and you can either stop at that wall or climb over it – I've been climbing over walls for years."

With this attitude, Cortez said, she was able to work through the struggles of trying to create a solid undergraduate research program for underrepresented students.

The Developing Scholars Program has been at K-State since 2000. With the amount of students involved being tripled within the last eight years, students have gone on to pursue careers beyond college. For the last eight years, Anita Cortez has been the driving force behind the program and said she doesn't plan on stopping any time soon.

"I wouldn't take credit for the development of this program," she said. "It was really kind of a joint project."

Cortez came to K-State several years ago as an undergraduate student. After receiving her degree in creative writing, she went on to pursue her masters in Wyoming. Cortez returned to K-State with her family and began working on trying to create an undergraduate research program for students. After receiving the idea for the program from the University of Michigan and collaborating with faculty and staff, the K-State Developing Scholars Program was born.

There were a few early struggles in the beginning of the program, including funding, commitments and creating an awareness about the program on campus.

"When you're starting, people haven't heard of you," she explained. "You have to do a lot of [public relations] so people get to know you and what you're trying to get started."

Cortez worked hard to promote the new program and was able to find a group of committed students and faculty.

"She's always looking for students – she's always looking for funding," said Todd Easton, associate professor in industrial and manufacturing systems engineering. "It's her baby, and she takes good care of it."

Easton has been a faculty mentor in DSP for the last four years. The first year he was in the program he was approached by a student to do research. He enjoyed the program so much he began to approach potential students instead, he said.

"It's really nice because not only one

Hand-washing helps prevent spread of food-borne illnesses

Food-borne illnesses kill about 5,000 people each year, according to the Center of Disease Control and Prevention's Web site. Communication specialist for the Kansas Department of Health and Environment, Mike Heideman, said hand sanity is a good way to avoid some of the risks of getting sick.

"Washing with soap and warm water before and after eating or handling food or using the toilet can prevent cross contamination," Heideman said.

He said people should be sure to wash for at least 20 seconds being sure to clean under fingernails and all surfaces of the hands.

However, a task so simple is commonly taken for granted said Joye Gordon, associate professor of journalism, who has done research on how to communicate physical hazards. She said most people are unaware of the health risks some situations pose.

"Things people don't fear is what usually kills them," she said. "[Washing is] so important to us, culturally and socially."

Gordon said avoiding food-safety hazards is nearly impossible because every person interacts with food on a daily basis.

Andrew Reece, graduate student in food science, said the dangers associated with food contamination can range from cramps to bloody stool to vomiting or even death. Prevention of cross contamination is important with food storage, Reece said.

"Keep meats separate from fruits and vegetables," he said. "Sometimes people keep vegetables in the crispers and the juice from the meat will drip down on to the vegetables."

Proper food storage can also help keep food-borne bacteria from spreading. Reece said meats should be kept frozen, and if they are left sitting thawed for more than two days, they should be thrown out. Dairy products and fruits and vegetables should be kept no more than a week, he said. He also said people should pay more attention to food-storage guidelines and expiration dates.

"Expiration dates on most products usually refer to quality guidelines," Reece said. "It's not that the product isn't still good after the date, but it may not be at its best quality."

Reece said some bacteria are more common in certain foods than others.

"Ground beef has common strains of E.coli 015H7," he said. In chicken, Salmonellosis is most common, though

Local man arrested for assault

By Allison Voris
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Road rage might have gotten the best of a Manhattan man arrested for intentionally crashing into another vehicle Saturday night, according to Riley County Police reports.

RCPD Lt. Kurt Moldrup said police arrested Richard Whitesell, 54, after he allegedly struck the back of 1989 Chevy pickup truck driven by John Blackwell, 21 on purpose. Both Whitesell and Blackwell are from Manhattan.

Moldrup said the men had "exchanged looks" after Whitesell allegedly cut Blackwell off while the two were driving south on Tuttle Creek Boulevard. Whitesell then allegedly crashed into Blackwell as he was stopped at the intersection of Third Street and Bluemont Avenue.

Whitesell was charged with aggravated assault, criminal damage to property, reckless driving, possession of marijuana, possession of drug paraphernalia and driving under the influence, according to police reports. His bond was set at $7,000.

No injuries from the accident were reported.

Commissioner serves 4th term, supports K-State

By Mark Savoy
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Commissioner Bruce Snead was elected to city commission in 1995 and is serving his fourth term as city commissioner.

SNEAD

Snead has been mayor of Manhattan three times since being elected commissioner in 1995.

At present, Snead is focused on the multiple issues at hand within the Manhattan area.

"There are a variety of [issues] that are all important. Dealing with the growth of Fort Riley has been a dominant issue," Snead said. "Downtown redevelopment has certainly been controversial and important, and on a community-wide basis, the school board and bond question is very important."

Snead, raised in Chicago, earned a bachelor's degree in architecture from California Polytechnic State University and has worked at K-State as a State Extension Specialist since 1982.

He also has served as chairman of the Riley County Law Board, president of the Riley County-Manhattan Board of Health and chairman of the Manhattan Urban Area Planning Board.

He is the director on the League of Kansas Municipalities governing body and is the Energy Efficiency Representative on the Kansas Energy Council according to the Manhattan City Commission Web site.

Snead said he thinks the Central District redevelopment going on will greatly benefit students at K-State.

"Once completed, the Central District redevelopment will increase retail activity, housing and employment opportunities for students," Snead said. "The hotel and conference center will help. [It will] especially help the students focused on hotel management."

Last Tuesday, Snead proposed that the Manhattan City Commission study Photovoltaic Car Shade Canopies, which are solar-powered canopies for cars, and determine if the canopies could be used in the Warren Theatre parking lot to be developed in the south end redevelopment project.

Snead has made his appreciation for K-State known.

"K-State is the heartbeat of Manhattan," he said. "The activities of students and faculty and staff and all the wonderful aspects that a university brings are really central to Manhattan. The [Manhattan] calendar revolves around K-State's calendar."

City to handle traffic-signal issues

By Mark Savoy
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Manhattan City Commission will discuss traffic signal coordination for Fort Riley Boulevard tonight.

Commissioners will talk about the section of Fort Riley Boulevard – which is also Kansas Highway 18 – that stretches from the Manhattan Town Center entrance on East Poyntz Avenue to Richards Drive.

Commissioners also will review the rezoning of 2310 Candlewood Drive, city ordinances and rezoning the proposed Northwing Addition and McCall Landing.

"It'll be about as interesting as watching moss grow," Commissioner Bob Strawn said. "It all has to do with rezoning. It's like a business major taking a calculus class – it's just not fun."

The Manhattan City Commission will oversee whether the installation of the suggested Kansas Department of Transportation's Intelligent Transportation Systems will decrease business in areas adjacent to K-18.

According to the agenda, the Transportation Research Board has found the principle of substitution comes into effect when a customer can find a similar product, equal in cost and quality, closer to his or her home. As a result, they will not travel as far to get that same product.

The commission will listen to Eric Cattell, Manhattan's assistant director for planning, about rezoning efforts focused on the First Assembly of God Church at 2130 Candlewood Drive so members can sell fireworks to benefit their church.

The Manhattan Urban Area Planning Board has recommended the commission approve Frey Property Development Corporation's request to change a 106-acre tract of land east of the Marlatt Avenue and Tuttle Creek Boulevard intersection from an agriculture district to a residential district.

Manhattan City Commission is being pressured to approve rezoning efforts around McCall Landing. The rezoning focuses on changing the I-2 industrial park district to a commercial planned unit development.

Curly fry best represents Millenials with seasoning

JOE VOSSEN

There are some issues so inherently divisive, so politically charged, they threaten to make bitterest enemies from the greatest friends.

The history of the United States is full of such dissentious debates: Republic or Confederacy, slavery or freedom, government regulation or laissez-faire capitalism. As citizens argued (and often fought) to decide down which road the United States should embark, families were divided, and brother fought brother. All these hurdles our country overcame by way of compromise.

I fear, however, that an even darker storm of confrontation looms.

I am speaking of the issue of curly fries and waffle fries and the fervent fight being waged for the title of "America's Most Loved Trans-Fat Packed Tuber Snack Food."

All the brouhaha is compounded by the fact that we are in an election year. At press time, none of the three major campaigns had published an official stance on fried frenches. The silence of our most prominent politicians on this issue is only further proof of the enormity of the situation; clearly there will be much political posturing and polling of voters to determine which side would be most politically lucrative to support.

I urge you, Collegian reader, to write your lawmakers and voice your opinion. Public dialogue is necessary, it is American, and it is of the upmost importance to the future of our nation.

The war of words has reached fever pitch. In the K-State Student Union food court, cliques have been divided. The purveyors of curly fries and the consumers of waffle fries (once friends and close confidants) are no longer seated at the same table.

Gone are the proselytizing ministers and armed forces recruiters from the free speech zone in Bosco Plaza. They have been shouldered out by representatives from Arby's Army (those sympathetic to the curly fry cause, taking their name from the only national fast-food restaurant chain to always offer curly fries on its menu) and Cathy's Berserkers (waffle fry zealots who named themselves in honor of S. Truett Cathy, founder of Chick-fil-A restaurants and the only server of waffle fries on campus). Here, on the campus of K-State, we witness the fight firsthand.

Being only a humble opinion columnist with little training or understanding in food science, I will attempt to enumerate for this journal's readers why the true snack of the future, the tastiest tuber, is in fact curly fries. In double-blinded taste tests administered in the Union food court last week, curly fries were favored for taste by twice as many people as waffle fries (three people were involved in this study).

Before they are fried, curly fries are coated with paprika and other seasonings (unlike waffle fries, which are merely cut and thrown unlovingly into lava-hot peanut oil) leading to a much more palatable deep-fried experience. Said one person surveyed, "These so-called waffle fries taste like salty chalk."

French-fry aficionados will appreciate the crunchiness of the curly fry. The spiral shape of the curly fry is achieved with a special cutting tool that is either motor-driven or hand-turned. The cutting implement is set into one end of the potato and the potato rotated, creating the trademark spiral shape. The advantage, of course, is in the increased surface area achieved with the helix shape (over a waffle fry). With more precious potato in contact with delicious oil during frying, the result is a crispier, crunchier fry.

Finally, the curly fry is a relative newcomer to the salty potato snack saga. Food scientists and carbon-dating experts have placed the first curly fry at around 1981 AD. The classic shoestring-shaped fry traces its roots back to 19th-century France and Belgium. In a recent interview, former Student Body President Matt Wagner agreed the curly fry is the obvious choice for the symbol of our generation, the Millenials.

"I associate the waffle fry with unimportant issues like the Cold War, the free love movement and the legacy of Lyndon Johnson," Wagner said. "The curly fry is the symbol of the new, the snack of the Internet Age. Anyone who does not embrace it is living in the past – or probably uses Unix."

Unfailing texture deems waffle fry America's best

ADAM PHAM

One cannot take the particulars of potatoes too seriously.

To establish a hierarchy is necessary; to crown the waffle variety king of that hierarchy is obvious; to offer a defense of such a position is effortless.

And why should that be? The manifest weakness of the competition? We could distract ourselves with a drawn-out discussion of third-party candidates – the road too well-traveled – but most of the lot can be summarized in the space following the semicolon of a single sentence; steak fries are mushy, shoestring fries are gritty and almost everything else is either too trivial or too ordinary.

Curly fries do deserve their very own special rebuttal, if only for their startlingly effective frivolity. Why have so many bought into the curly cult, anyway?

"They're curly," the apologists lamely assert, as if novelty alone could serve a legitimate function. "They're so spicy and peppery, so savory; how could one fail to appreciate that?"

And what should be said about this seasoning? As is the case with tasteless little outfits like Arby's, this so-called seasoning isn't anything more than a crude preparation of paprika and onion powder glued onto a flash-frozen product.

So why engage in this unashamed debasement of their fries? What have they to hide? Need one wear a flamboyant necktie if the suit is Savile Row? Need a scrumptious porterhouse from a Michelin three-star be saturated in A1? Need a 30-year Balvenie ever be found in a highball glass cavorting with cola – or even ice cubes, for that matter? The implication here indicts itself.

But even if one were still to be concerned or convinced by the seasoning thesis, one mustn't allow opponents to suggest it is truly any kind of point in their favor; just because curly fries often happen to be seasoned does not preclude waffle fries receiving the same treatment. And indeed, wonderful, seasoned waffle fries are extant in proper restaurants across America. And while we're on the subject of versatility, waffle fries also can serve as delightful substitutes for tortilla chips with queso, unlike their inferior cousins, and they are more solidly structured to hold ketchup or mayonnaise. They're not only the greater canvas but the greater brush as well.

But one still might have reservations about the superiority of the form. Thus, we have left the most profound and most devastating point for last; curly fries must, by nature of their structure, be either chewier or mushier than waffle fries.

If a curler doesn't fry his wares long enough, they are damned to a rubbery, underdone fate, and if he fries them too long, they exchange their characteristic bounciness for a mushy, dry and separated existence. And there is no happy medium but rather only an intermediate wasteland in which the hapless consumer is treated to the consequences of both weaknesses.

Contrast this to the rather stable nature of the waffle fry, which remains solid and palatable even when overdone. And of course, when they're prepared properly, their high surface-to-mass ratio ensures a crispy shell with a buttery, molten center, something that by its physical nature, the curly fry could never hope to attain.

So whether in application or practice, it seems we can regardless observe the superiority of the waffle paradigm. In all, we are fortunate to have a Chik-Fil-A – the industry leader in the waffle style – in our student union, and for those who have weaned on stale, chewy fare like that served up routinely at ordinary fast-food joints, hand-cut waffle fries are a revelation, and nothing else will ever suffice.

TO THE POINT

KSU classes should use skills for good

TO THE POINT is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

It is difficult to watch television, go to a department store or buy a new CD without hearing about the severity of HIV/AIDS. Celebrities, athletes and politicians have voiced their support for finding a cure for the deadly virus and have lead efforts to raise awareness. However, too often HIV/AIDS is thought to be a threat that is worlds away in another country or culture.

It is easy to voice support for a cure by joining a Facebook.com group, and it is no hassle to watch an AIDS benefit concert on TV, but this is not enough. It is reassuring to see K-State students and Manhattan residents taking some initiative.

Instead of going to Aggieville for a couple of drinks and a quick bite to eat, the students in a K-State public relations marketing class chose to bring knowledge and awareness closer to Manhattan than a televised concert. Using a venue that is widely visited by other students is a very wise decision to show our peers the magnitude of the global AIDS crisis.

No place is AIDS free. More than 1,000 Kansans have the disease, and we should be helping them both directly and indirectly. And using class criteria to bring this knowledge to students and residents is commendable. We hope that other students, instructors and businesses will follow suit in learning more about the topic and will find out how they can contribute to a cure.

But awareness does not have to be isolated to one school, city or group. We should do our part on every level and push for more action locally and nationally. Let's take action now and keep fighting for more to be done.

Arizona State makes its way to Manhattan

By Ryne Witt
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State baseball team has faced its share of adversity this year.

The Wildcats have not lived up to some fans' expectations, have been inconsistent on the road and of their 47 games, 19 have been against ranked opponents.

That doesn't change tonight as the Wildcats face No. 3-ranked Arizona State at 6:30 tonight at Tointon Family Stadium. It will be K-State's 10th-straight game against a ranked foe. They have a 0-3 record all-time against Arizona State.

"I didn't know that," said junior Byron Wiley, who has hit .307 with seven RBI the last 10 games.

He also said coach Brad Hill upgraded the nonconference schedule this year.

"It put a lot of expectations on us – a lot of pressure on us to perform," Wiley said. "I think that it is helping us. It is definitely helping our RPI, even though we happen to lose a few of them.

"But we beat Cal-Irvine that one game and Wichita State. We're right up there with those teams. We got the same talent on the field."

The test today will be a little different for the Wildcats, as the Sun Devils are the highest-rated team K-State has faced all year.

Plus, they have the 2007 Pac-10 Conference Player of the Year Brett Wallace, who is hitting .404 on the year with 15 home runs and 59 RBI.

Wallace is not the only weapon on the team. His bash brother is fellow junior Ike Davis, who is batting .401 with 15 home runs and 62 RBI on the year, but Hill said they are not the only two he is worried about.

"They have excellent players in all the other positions too," he said. "Offensively, what we saw last year was they can sit there and hit a three-run homer, or they can bunt, steal a base and create offense that way. They can do so many things to you offensively. It's very dangerous – one of the best offensive clubs I have ever seen."

Still, Hill's club has faced its share of offensive firepower this year. When No. 22-ranked Oklahoma State came to Manhattan on March 28-30, it was the best offensive team in the Big 12 Conference. K-State took two of three games from the Cowboys and held them to only 12 runs in the series, including a Sunday complete-game shutout by junior Lance Hoge.

Senior Brett Scott said playing in the Big 12 has helped the Wildcats prepare for tonight's game.

"We play in a conference where each team could go win a national championship any year," Scott said. "It's just a matter of getting hot at the right time."

Wiley and Scott said that the game against Arizona State would be a good momentum builder for the Wildcats, who have two series left in the Big 12 against Oklahoma and then Kansas, and both said they think K-State can win tonight.

"We've played well enough to play with anyone in the country," Scott said. "We know that. We don't do it consistently enough.

"We are certainly not afraid of anybody."

Dellasega honored by conference for service awards

K-State sophomore catcher Daniel Dellasega is one of 12 student-athletes to be named to the 2008 Big 12 Conference Spring Sports Good Works Team, the league office has announced.

DELLASEGA

Dellasega, who is one of two baseball players to be named to the Spring Good Works team, has accumulated 3.53 GPA in accounting. The redshirt sophomore has served as one of the baseball representatives to the Student Athletes Advisory Committee (SAAC) for the past two years and will be the vice president of SAAC for the upcoming athletic year. He was instrumental in the inaugural Special Olympics Sports Clinic held in April and has also volunteered his time with the Walking' With a Wildcat mentor program, Read to Achieve, Adopt a Family and Cats for Cans.

The Big 12 Conference, in the second year of its Good Works Team recognitions, honors student-athletes for community service work. Each member institution selected a student-athlete for recognition based upon significant community service, good academic standing and participation in a Big 12-sponsored sport.

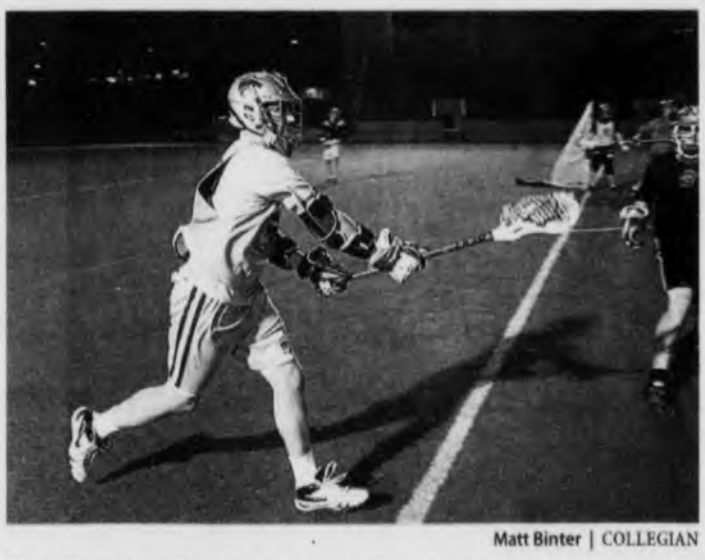
Lacrosse season ends in playoff game

By Justin Nutter
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State men's lacrosse team lost 18-1 to the University of Missouri Friday at the Great Rivers Conference playoffs in St. Louis. It was the last action of the season for the Wildcats, who were playing in their first-ever Division 1-A playoff game.

Sophomore midfielder Ben Coughlin said the 2008 season has been a success for K-State.

"One of the team's major goals was to make the playoffs this year," Coughlin said. "We accomplished that, so I would say it's been a good year. The season was a success as a whole."



Coughlin said a bigger, deeper Missouri team doomed the Wildcats in the long run.

"I think they traveled with about 25, but we only brought 16 guys," he said. "Depth and size were the biggest issue."

He said despite the lopsided outcome, the Wildcats played to the best of their abilities.

"Considering their advantage in depth and size, I think we did pretty well," he said. "I felt we performed as best as we could."

The loss caps off a season in which the Wildcats compiled a 7-7 overall record, including a 4-1 record in division play, and earned their first post-season bid in three years as members of the Great Rivers Lacrosse Conference. Prior to the season, the decision was made to split the conference into two subdivisions, and the Wildcats took advantage of the split by finishing the season atop the division standings.

Columnist hands out awards for 2007-08 teams, moments of the year

After columnist Brad Dornes gave out some personal awards to K-State athletes and some honorable mentions to teams which had good seasons, I decided to give out a few awards myself.

JOEL JELLISON

My two awards will go to the team of the year and the best moment of the K-State athletic season.

First up, the nominees for team of the year, starting with the volleyball team. The Wildcats settled comfortably in the Top 25 throughout the season and finished off in the NCAA Tournament.

The second nominee is the women's basketball team, who went from worst to first in the Big 12 Conference, winning the regular-season title. The women moved on to the second round of the NCAA Tournament where they lost to Louisville. The Wildcats lost two of its last three games, but played each without leading scorer, senior Kimberly Dietz who was injured in the Big 12 Tournament.

Our third nominee is the men's basketball team. Led by Michael Beasley and a healthy Bill Walker, the Wildcats ended the drought against KU in Bramlage Coliseum and finally made it back to March Madness. After upsetting USC in the first round, K-State fell to Wisconsin, and Beasley and Walker declared for the NBA Draft.

My nod goes to the women's basketball team. I listened to coaches all over the Big 12, the toughest conference in women's basketball this season that nearly put 11 teams in the NCAA Tournament, call the starting five of the Wildcats the best in the league and one of the top in the nation.

And now for the top moments of the year. First off, Jordy Nelson's one-handed catch against Baylor. Nelson made a fingertip grab at a ball going behind him and scooped it up for a big gain.

Nelson actually appears in the nominees for this award twice for me. Though the football team lost to KU, Nelson gave Wildcat fans hope when he burned KU's Aqib Talib deep for a long touchdown.

The men's basketball team settles in for the next two "big moment" nominees. First is the Wildcats' win at Oklahoma, fueled by a last-second shot. In one of the shining highlights of the team's season, Jacob Pullen penetrated the lane and passed the ball off to Beasley inside the lane for a lay-up.

The biggest moment of the year, however, easily goes to our last nominee. The men's basketball team's win over KU at Bramlage Coliseum. No, it wasn't a last-second shot or a specific highlight moment but a complete game against a team which had caused 20-plus years of hardship in the Wildcats' home gym.

Several of the athletes who made these moments possible this year will no longer be a part of the athletic department next season, but that only means one thing. It opens up the possibility for new players to make moments that will effect K-State athletic history forever.

So to the 2007-08 season that is coming to a close: It's been good. But here's to the next season of K-State sports and the new moments to come.

Joel Jellison is a championship-caliber first/third-base youth coach currently out of work and looking for a job on a team. department benefits," he said. "This is giving students the opportunity to do things they normally wouldn't do."

Easton said several students have gone on to complete their master's degrees and obtain jobs. He said the program is very beneficial, and students need to be willing to take the initiative to get involved and talk to Cortez if they are interested in the program.

"The relationship that we have is very reciprocal," said Clemente Jaquez-Herrera, graduate student in architecture. "She has been my mentor ever since I basically got to college."

Jaquez-Herrera, graduate assistant for DSP, said he has known Cortez since his first month here at K-State. He approached her about the DSP program, and from then on developed a strong relationship with Cortez, he said.

"I was a bit afraid about the university experience," he said. "Within her, I found the confidence to strive for my goals."

Jaquez-Herrera went three years in the program and then began working for Cortez. He said Cortez was there for him with whatever problems he had, both academic and personal issues. This year, Jaquez-Herrera has received about nine honors and awards, all of which he credits to Cortez's support.

"She always has been my support system," he said. "Because of this, I have been able to achieve and accomplish all of the things that I have here at K-State."

Jaquez-Herrera said he appreciated Cortez because she always challenged him mentally and helped him figure out his path. He said she helped him prepare for his future, and that incoming students should use Cortez as a resource.

"Students should realize that Anita is there to help them in every way possible," he said. "Not just in academia, but she is there to help them grow as a student, as individuals and as professionals."

Cortez said she is not done with DSP yet and the program is still growing. With future goals like providing funding for traveling abroad, Cortez said the best part of her job is seeing students graduate and move on to better opportunities.

"I want to see more opportunities for the students I serve than were available to me," she said. "The more successful they are, the easier the path is for those that come after them."

she learned from contributing to the project.

"I think it was a very rewarding experience for all of us, because we were able to get out into the community and actually work with organizations," she said. "Everybody got an a lot of insight, good and bad, about what it's like to work for an organization and do the PR and marketing."

During the semester, students in the class also dealt with PR agencies and organizations involved in HIV/AIDS prevention, which provided them with fresh ideas and first-hand business tactics.

"These guys spent three or four years studying public relations, and this class gave them the opportunity to use what they learned over the time and be creative," said Isaac Madison, director of the Regional AIDS Project.

He also said the Regional AIDS Project will use the created materials in future campaigns.

it is not limited to just chicken."

Salmonellosis is an infection with a bacteria called Salmonella, according to the CDC Web site. A person infected with Salmonellosis could have diarrhea for up to a week. According to the site, the bacteria is passed from feces of people or animals to other people or animals.

Proper refrigeration is also important in preventing the spread of some bacteria. Gordon said a common cause of the problem locally is that students' refrigerators are not kept cold enough.

"They should keep the temperature 40 degrees Fahrenheit or below," she said. "Some pathogens thrive in cold temperatures," she said.

Reece said students should also pay attention to packaging labels. He said using a microwave oven to cook food is not a proper substitute for a standard oven if that's what a package calls for.

"Sometimes packaging can be really vague, and the food may seem fully cooked, but isn't," he said.

Additionally, students can visit foodsafety.ksu.edu and barfblog.ksu.edu for more information about food safety.

While there are many food-safety tips out there that can help in preventing food-borne illnesses, Gordon said washing your hands is the most important step people can take to protect their health.

"Wash, clean, separate and cook," she said. "It's hard to chase down a food-borne breakout – so many come and go."

Summer tunes

COURTESY PHOTOS

Music festivals to headline Radiohead, Pearl Jam

If last summer was a good concert season, this year should blow it out of the water. With Radiohead crossing the pond, Rage Against the Machine rearing its head and Jack Johnson coming out of retirement, this summer's festivals promise to be the best in years. Many big-name lineups are sure to please concert attendees.

ERIC DAVIS

LOLLAPALOOZA

From Aug. 1-3, Grant Park in Chicago will turn into a giant music-filled festival ground. The lineup boasts Radiohead, Rage Against the Machine and Kanye West, along with more than 75 acts that should fill the three-day music fest with amazing sounds.

The members of Radiohead, whose presence almost guarantees a great show, do not play together often anyway, and the fact they will be at Lolla is incredible.

Rage Against the Machine also will be at Lollapalooza as one of the headliners. The band took too long of a break but has been playing a few shows here and there since it burst back onto the scene last year at Coachella. Rage's music alone gets listeners fired up, so I can only imagine what a live show will be like.

Kanye West, the third of the three headliners, also will be in Chicago. At the very least, West has an excellent first album to perform songs from.

BONNAROO

The only way the line-up for Bonnaroo this year could have been more anticipated than last year was if the Beatles were booked. After having The Police last season, concert attendees were assured a little bit of disappointment when this year's set list was released.

The main headliners for this are Pearl Jam, Metallica and Jack Johnson, and you have to wonder why these three bands were chosen to headline the same festival.

Pearl Jam was the main headliner of Lolla last year and obviously liked being No. 1 because they are filling the same shoes this year in Manchester, Tenn. Eddie Vedder has been known to get a little political while on stage, and with the Olympics starting not long after Bonnaroo, concert attendees should expect to receive a few pieces of Vedder's mind.

Jack Johnson also will be there, and it should be nice to hear from him again after a very quiet year. If Johnson's new album is any indicator of what his show will include, we can expect to see a great act.

WAKARUSA

The first festival I ever attended was Wakarusa, so it will always have a special place in my heart. According to the Wakarusa Web site, the festival started in 2004, so it's relatively young. It's still struggling to book big-name acts, but those names are getting bigger every year.

This year, the headliners include The Flaming Lips, Emmylou Harris and Ben Folds.

This won't be the first time the Lips will headline, but they still deliver a dynamite show every time. They headlined the year I went and put on a very different show. They have a pretty hardcore following, ensuring there will be quite a few people dancing in the lawn when they take the stage.

I must admit I had never heard anything about Emmylou Harris before I read about her on Wakarusa's Web site. Apparently she has been around for years and has "achieved popularity in pop, folk, country and now alternative."

Wakarusa: STS9, CAKE, Zappa Plays Zappa, Keller Williams, Tea Leaf Green and Brett Dennen.

MUSIC REVIEW

Foals debut album blends band's own bizarre, optimistic sounds

"Antidotes"

Review by Jonathan Garten

Many bands probably would jump at the opportunity to hire TV on the Radio's David Sitek as a producer for their first album, and the Foals were no exception.

However, after hearing Sitek's mix for the original version of "Antidotes," the band rejected it, saying it sounded like it was recorded in the Grand Canyon. After listening to what the band created on its own, it's easy to see they made a good decision.

Most of the album's 13 tracks possess an eerie, fun sound that makes the Foals sound like an upbeat version of Radiohead. Many of the tracks also feature a spastic horn section that makes even me want to get up and dance.

Frontman Yannis Philippakis might have learned a fair amount of his style from fellow Brit and Bloc Party frontman Kele Okereke. Philippakis' accent is noticeable but never annoying.

The album's lyrics are repetitive and random. For instance, "Heavy Water" is about vampires and "Two Steps, Twice" is about bad dancing. In fact, "Heavy Water" contains less than 50 words in the entire song.

"We communicate/ Communicate/ Cheap dreams of empty swings around/ We communicate/ Vampires and their guns/ We all eat clouds now/ We all eat clouds now/ To pass the time away/ To pass the time away/ To be away/ We fight these vampires/ Fight these vampires."

The strongest track is "Cassius." While most of the songs take at least 10 seconds to even get going, "Cassius" makes no apologies for startling its listeners with its opening riff. The song's rampant – but not rushed – pace sets it apart from the other tracks.

"Balloons" is also worth a second listen. The band shows off its full array of instrumental talents for a minute before breaking into any lyrics. Philippakis mixes a few yelps and shouts into his usual droning delivery.

The band is also successful during slower, softer songs like "Olympic Airways." The track begins passively as it builds up toward the end, but it still stays true to the style the band establishes throughout the album.

The bonus version of "Antidotes" includes extra tracks "Hummer" and "Mathletics," which were supposed to be on the original CD. Since the CD only had 11 songs, it was interesting to hear what it would have sounded like had Sitek gotten his chance to produce the entire CD.

Overall, I would consider the Foals' debut a smashing success, and I'm looking forward to hearing how it develops its sound from a very strong start. If you're into bands like Bloc Party or The Cure, you should definitely check out the Foals.

6 U.S. sites serve as contenders for controversial NBAF

By Adrianne DeWeese
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

This is the last article in a four-part series examining K-State as a proposed site for the National Bio and Agro-Defense Facility, the facility's purpose and its potential effects on Manhattan residents and the K-State community if the Manhattan site is selected in October 2008.

The list went from 29 submitted proposals to 18 proposed locations to six finalists for the National Bio and Agro-Defense Facility.

With the Department of Homeland Security's October decision now less than six months away, several community members continue to express concern about Manhattan as a proposed site for NBAF.

Some claim that such a facility should remain isolated, while K-State administration maintain that Manhattan serves as the best of the proposed sites.

LOCATION: MAINLAND VERSUS ISLAND

Gary Conrad, university distinguished professor of biology, said he understands the importance of a facility like NBAF for research and the preparation of a biological attack. He also said he has not researched the other five proposed NBAF sites.

Conrad said he is only concerned with the proposed building of such a facility in Manhattan and possible safety risks. Such a facility puts the city, the university and area feedlots at risk, he said.

In 1968, Conrad received his doctoral degree in developmental and cellular biology from Yale University. He maintains a folder of more than 20 news and magazine articles, blog entries and U.S. Senate testimony about the NBAF and Plum Island Animal Disease Center, with several articles dating back to 2002.

In August 2005, Homeland Security announced it would replace the Plum Island Animal Disease Center off northeastern Long Island with the National Bio and Agro-Defense Facility. The current facility was built in 1954, and it does not have Biosafety Level-4 capabilities to meet current and future research needs, according to Homeland Security's Web site.

Conrad said advantages exist for having the NBAF located on an island. Though he is not certain what specific island should be used, he said East Coast islands farther out in the Atlantic Ocean should be an option. Plum Island is 840 acres of land that lies one and a half miles from Orient Point, N.Y., and nine miles from Old Saybrook, Conn.

"The prevailing winds and the direction of them always made Plum Island be described as an optimal spot because the prevailing winds would blow any accidentally released things out to the east, out into the Atlantic," Conrad said. "I think that would make much more sense that having it anywhere in Kansas because so much of Kansas does raise cattle and raise livestock. It's going to be hard to find a place anywhere in Kansas where for a 50-mile radius - particularly downwind, eastward – there aren't livestock being raised."

The following are the four BSL-4 facilities now in operation in populated U.S. urban areas: Atlanta; Fort Detrick, Md.; Galveston, Texas; and San Antonio. There has never been public exposure at a BSL-4 U.S. lab, according to Homeland Security's Web site.

These facilities, along with the proposed NBAF, are designed to not have an outbreak associated with them, said Dr. Jerry Jaax, K-State associate vice president for research compliance and university veterinarian. Jaax served 26 years with the U.S. Army Veterinary Corps, and among his assignments, Jaax served as chief of the veterinary

Professor claims funding misuse

By Adrianne DeWeese
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A K-State university distinguished professor claims indirect funds from the National Institutes of Health were misused for other university facilities, but university administration claims the funds were used for costs associated with research.

During an interview on Monday, Gary Conrad, university distinguished professor in biology, said K-State's Division of Biology receives grants from the National Science Foundation and from the National Institutes of Health.

With NIH, for every $100,000 per year of direct research money to a faculty member, an additional $40,000-$50,000 is given to the university to cover indirect cost funds. Conrad said indirect cost funds might include electricity, water or plumbing repairs.

"It is a legitimate cost because these are costs that would not occur if research did not take place at the university," Conrad said.

In November 2007, Conrad wrote a letter to the editor to the Manhattan Mercury that stated the Division of Biology's indirect cost funds were being used to support the Biosecurity Research Institute, a biosafety level-3 facility that is adjacent to the College of Veterinary Medicine. Conrad said he considers this wrongful use of the funds.

"To me, that constitutes a misuse of public funds," Conrad said in an e-mail. "That biosecurity lab has nothing whatever to do with the research grant that the NIH-National Eye Institute awarded to me together with annual indirect cost support funds."

Conrad also expressed concern on Monday that university administration might harvest indirect cost funds associated with the National Bio and Agro-Defense Facility. K-State is one of six national finalists for the facility, which would be adjacent to the BRI.

"I don't see how that's going to happen," Conrad said.

As a response to Conrad's letter, university administration sent a letter to the editor at the Mercury that was published on Nov. 15, 2007. Ron Trewyn, K-State vice president for research, and Tom Rawson, vice

BSU expands tutoring opportunities to strengthen GPAs

By Clifford Watkins
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

While some student organizations are all about play, members of K-State's Black Student Union schedule time as a group to take care of education.

To promote academic success, weekly study sessions sponsored by BSU take place from 7-10 p.m. every Monday in Hale Library Room 301A.

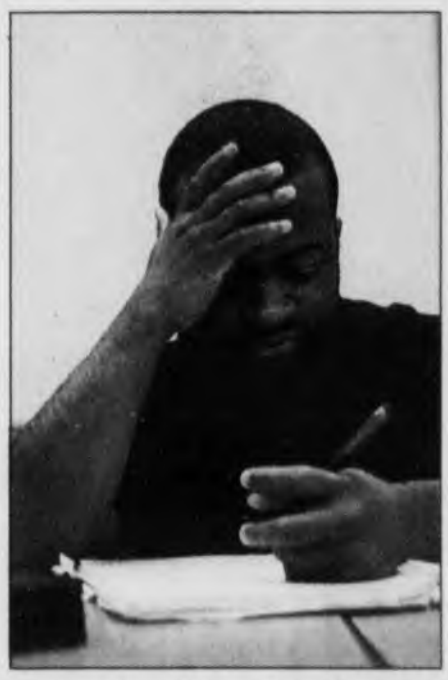
"We realize the importance of academics," said BSU president Bryon Williams.

Williams, senior in economics, said BSU's goal is to have an average GPA of 3.0 for the academic year, and he said he feels these study sessions are helping the cause.

"We are much stronger than we were," Williams said.

Organized study sessions began two years ago under the leadership of former BSU president Josh Criswell and member Ashley Messick. Williams said the study sessions began as a dead week activity to get ready for finals, but they became weekly after current BSU educational chair Brittany Delaney proposed the change.

Delaney, sophomore in communication sciences and disorders, said she felt some students just don't have the right mindset and dedication after high school to meet the demands of a college curriculum.



"Coming from high school, most students don't have motivation and dedication," she said. "Then when they find out how hard the work is, they have trouble building that motivation up."

She said she thinks attending study sessions can help with that problem.

"It helps you to get involved more and meet more people who have the same educational values as you," Delaney said.

BSU study sessions also offer tutors in subjects like math and chemistry.

"Most students don't feel comfortable asking for help, but this opportunity makes it easier," Delaney said.

Tutor Deepthi Rampally, graduate student in electrical engineering, said tutors don't mind volunteering their time to help students find answers.

"It's great – I get to guide students all the way until they get the problems through," she said. Rampally attends the study sessions to tutor students who

WEATHER WATCH: TORNADO SEASON

As Manhattan is located within tornado alley, residents should understand the severity of these storms. Disasters areas such as those in Greensburg, Kan., and years ago in Hoisington, Kan., give understanding to the massive destruction. Here are some facts from the National Weather Service to prepare you for the upcoming tornado season:

TORNADO MYTHS	FACTS
Areas near lakes, rivers and mountains are safe from tornadoes.	No place is safe from tornadoes. A tornado near Yellowstone National Park left a path of destruction up and down a 10,000 foot mountain.
The low pressure with a tornado causes buildings to explode as the tornado overhead passes.	Violent winds and debris slamming into buildings cause most structural damage.
Windows should be opened before a tornado approaches to equalize the pressure and minimize damage.	Leave windows alone. The most important action is to go to the storm shelter.
People caught in the open should seek shelter under the overpass.	Take shelter in a sturdy reinforced building if possible.

SAFETY PRECAUTIONS

In a house with a basement: Avoid windows. Get in the basement and under some kind of sturdy protection (heavy table or work bench), or cover yourself with a mattress or sleeping bag. Know where very heavy objects rest on the floor above (pianos, refrigerators, waterbeds, etc.) and do not go under them. They might fall down through a weakened floor and crush you.

In a house with no basement, a dorm, or an apartment: Avoid windows. Go to the lowest floor, small center room (like a bathroom or closet), under a stairwell or in an interior hallway with no windows. Crouch as low as possible to the floor, facing down; and cover your head with your hands. A bath tub might offer a shell of partial protection. Even in an interior room, you should cover yourself with some sort of thick padding (mattress, blankets, etc.), to protect against falling debris in case the roof and ceiling fail.

CITY COMMISSION

Manhattan bikers appeal to commissioners to improve access

Matt Binter | COLLEGIAN

Sarah Heidebrecht (left), K-State graduate student in apparel and textiles, Claire Armstrong (middle), sophomore in public health nutritions and Alex Betzen (right), first-year veterinarian student, joined several other bikers in attendance at the City Commission meeting Tuesday night to support making Manhattan more bicycle friendly.

By Mark Savoy
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Manhattan City Commission listened to a presentation about the Kansas Department of Transportation's Intelligent Transportation Systems Tuesday night during its weekly meeting. The Commission also approved an agreement that will install sensors and possibly cameras at nine stop lights along Fort Riley Boulevard from East Poyntz Avenue to Richards Drive. The design will be created by the City of Manhattan, but the job itself will be paid for by the State of Kansas.

If successful, ITS will improve travel times from the west side to east side of Manhattan on Kansas Highway 18. The system will also have a wireless remote monitoring system, which will serve to make adjustments to stop lights for better traffic flow. It would also allow Manhattan residents to look at traffic before they drive on K-18.

Several Manhattan bike riders also spoke about the Bicycle Master Plan during the public comment period. Diane Novak, bicyclist and Manhattan resident, spoke and asked all bikers present to rise in the City Commission chambers and more than 25 bikers stood. Novak asked the commission to be mindful of bikers as the commission progresses in the south end development.

Paula Goldwyn, life-long Manhattan resident, presented a petition in support of a dog park. She gathered about 550 signatures for the dog park petition and said the signatories asked that the dog park develop as fast as possible.

Commissioner Bob Strawn informed Goldwin that a change of ordinance might be required, but the "DNA" was in place to get the dog park started.

The commission also approved the rezoning of a residential district and turned it into a restricted-business district. The rezoning efforts, which were for the First Assembly of God Church, 2310 Candlewood Drive, will allow the church to sell fireworks for Independence Day.

Two other rezoning ordinances were approved. In one ordinance, housing-developer Land Frey Property Development Corporation desired 1,440 feet east of Marlatt Avenue to be used to develop new houses.

The second ordinance rezoned McCall Landing from an industrial park district to a Commercial Planned Unit Development District.

The approximate 26-acre tract of land is generally located north of the intersection of McCall Road and Carlson Street, south of Levee Drive, west of McCall Pattern Company and east of Abbott Management and Sunflower Self-Storage.

2 laptops stolen in Manhattan area

A $1,360 Dell laptop and carrying bag were taken from a Manhattan-Ogden Unified School District 383 vehicle Saturday, according to a Riley County Police Department report. The laptop was stolen while victim and USD 383 employee Shawn Rafferty, 32, of 1925 Morning Glory Drive, was inside Dairy Queen at 3116 Anderson Ave.

Manhattan-Ogden Unified School District 383 was also reported as a victim because the laptop belonged to the district. RCDP Lt. Kurt Moldrup said a vehicle belonging to the school district was left unsecure at the time of the theft.

In another laptop burglary report, a $1,000 silver Dell laptop was stolen from the front desk of the Best Western hotel, 601 E. Poyntz Ave. The victim, Antone Dreibus, 33, of Omaha, Neb., left the laptop unattended at the front desk on Monday, Moldrup said.

Investigation leads to arrest in assault case

Staff report
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A Manhattan man was arrested Tuesday for attempted kidnaping, robbery, aggravated assault and intimidation of a victim, according to a Riley County Police Department press release.

On early Friday morning, a woman was approached while walking near 10th and Kearney streets. The victim tried to dial 911 on her cell phone, but the suspect took it and her purse and fled the scene. The victim then walked to a nearby friend's house and called 911. The suspect was described as a short, stocky Hispanic man with short hair and a round face.

The suspect is believed to be Orlando Perez-Salgado, 28, of 2528 Brittany Ridge and was identified in an RCPD investigation and arrested. Perez-Salgado's bond was set at $50,000 and was confined at the Riley County Jail.

Falling down

Derby runner-up shows striking semblance to other dead Hillary affiliates

BRETT KING

The sun pours down from the sky and the smell of dust enters the nostrils of spectators. A steady buzz comes from those watching in anticipation for the race to begin. Suddenly the gates fly open and world-class horses take off charging around the track, trying to get ahead.

Just like us, they push and strive to get ahead, but through no fault of their own, sometimes fall flat on their faces.

Most Saturday night conversations mentioned the events that unfolded at Churchill Downs, home of the Kentucky Derby. After the horses had already crossed the finish line, the second place finisher, Eight Belles, collapsed suddenly after completing the race. Shattering both front ankles, the filly had no hope for recovery. The humane action, which was taken by the veterinarians, was to euthanize the horse on the track.

Over the past few days, people and organizations have wanted to find ways to blame someone for the situation. Once again there has been a push for Churchill Downs to replace its dirt track with an artificial surface to prevent injuries in horses. However, this course of action plays against tradition.

Preventative measures are acceptable for reducing the risk of injury, but People for the Ethical Treatment of Animals believes the jockey is responsible for the injuries. According to the Associated Press on May 4, PETA sent a letter to Kentucky's racing authority calling for the suspension of Gabriel Saez.

PETA spokeswoman Kathy Guillermo told the Associated Press, "What we really want to know is, did he feel anything along the way? If he didn't, then we can probably blame the fact that they're allowed to whip the horses mercilessly."

Of course, the whipping of the horse did not cause this injury, but what can you expect from an organization that believes animals have the exact same rights as humans?

Eight Belles could have just fallen victim to the Clinton corpse curse. According to another Associated Press story on May 4, Eight Belles was "endorsed by presidential contender Hillary Clinton and cheered by daughter Chelsea." Though no charges have ever been filed against the Clintons, a few former business partners and friends have died mysteriously. These deaths, which were determined to be suicides, include Ed Willey, who died the same day his wife Kathleen Willey was allegedly sexually assaulted by Bill Clinton. Another victim was Suzanne Coleman, whose death was ruled a suicide despite being found with a gunshot wound to the back of the head after having an affair with Bill when he was Arkansas attorney general.

Perhaps after being disgraced by losing and being endorsed by Hillary Clinton, Eight Belles couldn't take the shame and decided to join the illustrious group of suicide victims with the common tie of knowing the Clintons.

In all reality, we shouldn't play the blame game; simple genetics can explain this incident. Racing horses, like royalty, are created through blood lines of breeding. After generations those blood lines become too intermingled, producing undesirable traits. A water head, inbred horse with a 1,200 pound body on toothpick legs sounds like a recipe for disaster.

Some accidents can't be explained. This situation has contributing factors, but in the end it was just an accident.

TO THE POINT

K-State, region should send support to Myanmar

Cyclone Nargis hit Myanmar early Saturday morning, causing a huge tidal wave that swept over the country. The storm has killed at least 22,000 people and left 41,000 missing, according to a BBC article from Tuesday.

TO THE POINT is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

To put this in perspective, according to the article, the estimated death toll for Hurricane Katrina in 2005 was about 2,000.

At the same time, foreign aid has started pouring in, though at a slower rate than necessary for the thousands in need.

This is the perfect time for K-Staters to show their humanitarian sides and try to energize support from the United States. There are many different ways to help the cause. For example, students, faculty and staff could set up groups on campus and/or online, where money and supplies can be gathered locally to send to aid organizations.

Even though Myanmar's government has been skeptical of foreign aid in the past, outside nations like the United States must try to help. The magnitude of this disaster is too great for them to handle on their own. What's important right now is finding the people who have been left homeless and bringing them to safety.

As a society, we must send our support to those in need, even if they are across the world.

Hey, Collegian: Get your articles correct.

I think it's ironic how the border patrol was at the Union today, it being Cinco de Mayo.

All the hot chicks marry dorky-looking dudes because there are no hot guys at K-State.

Hey, Ian Campbell: You look like Daddy Warbucks.

There's a monster in Tuttle Creek Lake.

The revelation of the day: Marijuana is a Mexican word. Happy Cinco de Mayo.

So, my sister and I just got out of Target, and there was definitely a guy with a guitar serenading all the customers while we were waiting in line. I couldn't help but laugh.

That's what she said last night at the party when he said his brother said that I said I hate you. That's what she said.

To the blond Tri-Delt in my intro to mass comm. class: Sorry for staring, but you're really easy on my eyes.

To whoever was running the lights at Old Stadium on Monday night: You suck at life. There was like 45 people out there wanting to play soccer when you turned the lights out.

You know college is amazing if it's 10:27 p.m. and you're already drunk from celebrating Cinco de Mayo.

How dare you, Collegian. I had to sit through my chemistry lecture because you didn't put in a new crossword. I hate you.

If you can't find your keys, should you be driving home? Just wondering.

To whoever got three quotes in the Fourum in one day: The record is at least six.

Talk show host Rush Limbaugh needs to change tune

GRADY BOLDING

Talk radio – the oasis of the First Amendment. From Howard Stern to crazed political pundits, talk radio is an American icon that demonstrates some of the strongest values in the U.S., by which I mean being able to pop your mouth off about whatever you want for whatever reason and not get in trouble for it.

Take my friend Rush Limbaugh, for instance. The man made a name for himself during the 1990s and has gradually become another well-known mouth on talk radio. Of course, this guy's rhetoric has not let up over the years.

On April 26, an article in the Tampa Tribune reported that Limbaugh implemented "Operation Chaos," during which he advised Republican listeners to vote for Sen. Hillary Clinton, D-N.Y., in the Democratic primaries to keep her in the race against Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill. Thus, the Democratic Party would be so torn between Obama and Clinton that it would eventually "implode," or something like that.

However, it was Limbaugh's comment on his own radio station on April 23 that caused eyebrows to raise.

"The dream end of this is that this keeps up to the convention and that we have a replay of Chicago 1968," he said in reference to the upcoming Democratic Convention in August – with burning cars, protests, fires, riots and all that. That's Limbaugh's objective here.

Harsh? You bet. In fact, the man's delusions reached their apex on his show on April 24 after listeners called in complaining about the statements.

"I am not inspiring or inciting riots," Limbaugh stated. "I am dreaming of riots in Denver."

Smart move, Limbaugh. Way to fan the partisan flames that have been destroying this country since the 2000 election. Apart from Limbaugh and his Mansonist fantasies.

For those of you who remember the 1990s, the fad battle among politicians was a "leftist, one-world government" versus the "right-wing" militia movement. Of course, Limbaugh clearly stated which side he was on in the Washington Post on April 25, 1995, just seven days after the Oklahoma City bombing.

"The second violent American revolution is just about – I got my fingers about a quarter of an inch apart – is just about that far away," Limbaugh said, "because these people are sick and tired of a bunch of bureaucrats in Washington driving into town and telling them what they can and can't do with their land."

Christina Forsberg | COLLEGIAN

By "these people," he meant the militias, which were later proven to have no connection with the bombing. Whether it was taken in context or not, Limbaugh caught heat for the fiery rhetoric. In fact, he even went on to write a one-page column for Newsweek on May 8, 1995, titled "Why I'm Not To Blame."

And he was right. He was never to blame. The political turmoil of the '90s was bound to explode, and it did in the fires of Waco and Oklahoma City, taking a lot of innocent people with it – children mostly. Such rhetoric was popular among those disillusioned with the government, just as it is today. When it finally did explode, anyone with any say in the situation immediately sought to distance themselves from the flames.

Today, unlike then, Limbaugh has no excuse if the Democratic Convention blows up. In fact, there is a leftist group out there called "Recreate 68," which is exactly what it intends to do at the convention in Denver this August.

Cliché as it sounds: Be careful what you wish for, because you might get anarchy – or even a police state – in return.

Grady Bolding finally turned 21 last Sunday. Please send comments to opinion@spub.ksu.edu.

K-State professor reaches summit of Mt. Kilimanjaro

By Lacy Skinner
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

It's one of the fabled seven summits of the world and stands more than 19,000 feet high. Mount Kilimanjaro in Tanzania, Africa intimidation wasn't enough to make K-State professor Lorena Passarelli back down.

"This is my first real adventure, and I had been looking forward to it for it a long time," Passarelli, assistant professor of biology, said.

When planning an extreme hike, climbers should have technical climbing skills and be in shape.

But to scale Mount Kilimanjaro, Passarelli said strength, determination and patience are essential.

"Be reasonably fit," Passarelli said.

Passarelli prepared by running everyday and running up and down steps, which she said helped her significantly to prepare for the long trip.

"On summit day, beginning at midnight, we trekked for 16 hours," she said.

Passarelli first became interested in climbing Mount Kilimanjaro when she and her cousin decided to travel to Tanzania.

The Mount Kilimanjaro summit climb was arranged through a group from the United Kingdom and a group of 10 people, including Passarelli, came from all over the world for the adventure.

"Our group consisted of individuals from Australia, Canada and the United States with ages ranging from 34 to 67," she said.

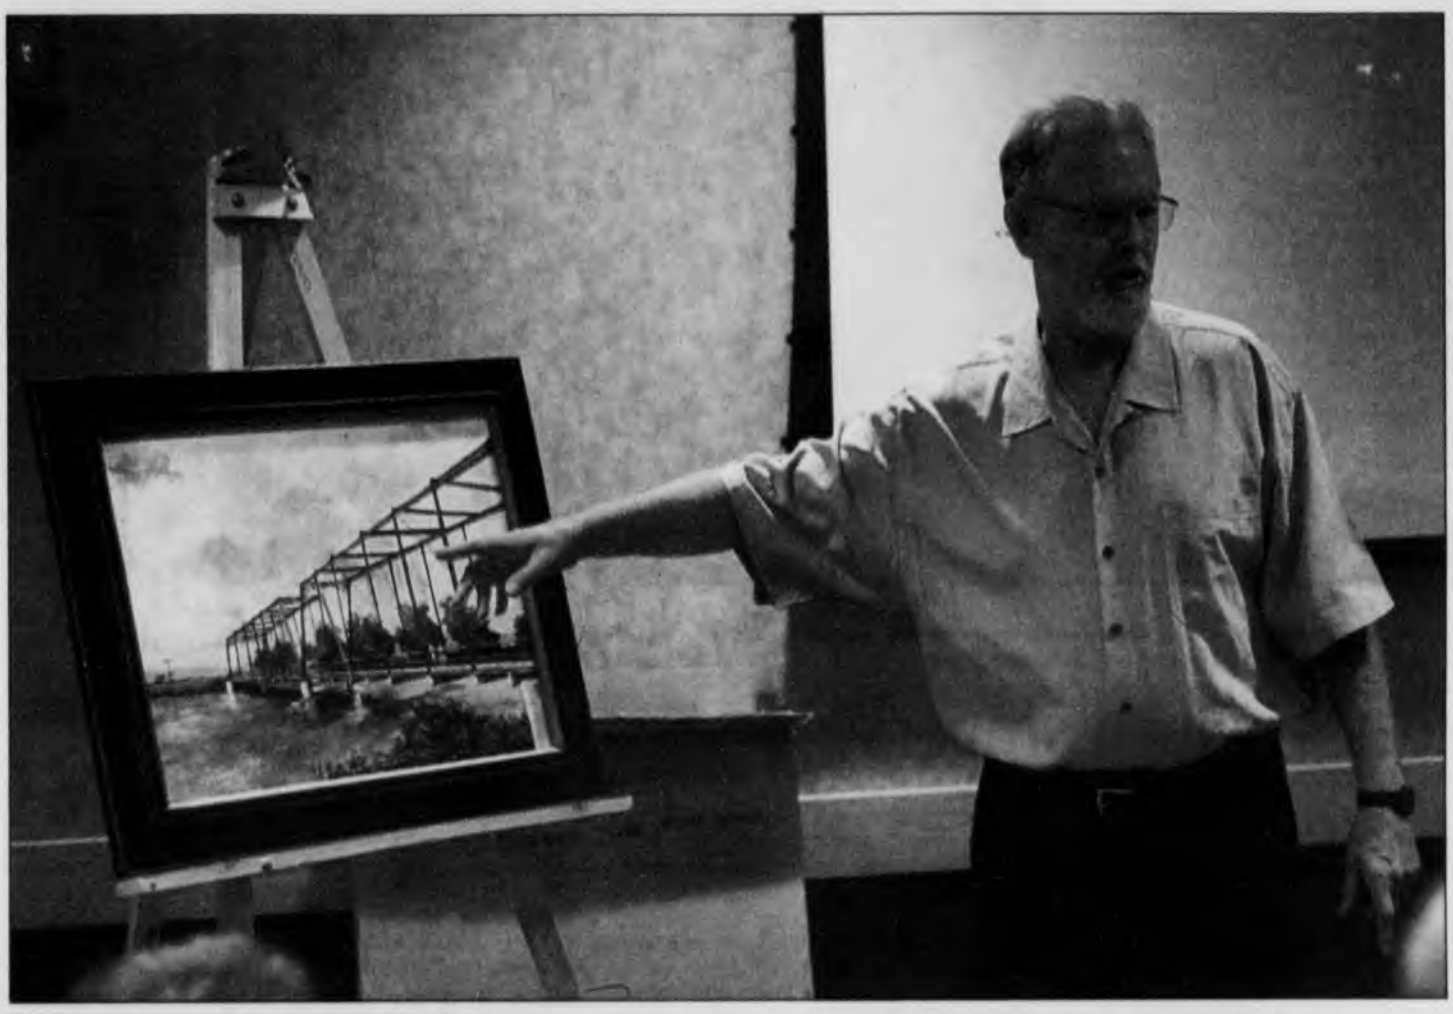
Though she was excited to finally have an adventure, Passarelli said it was an exhausting eight-day climb to the summit.

The group endured strong winds, rain, cold temperatures and an unforgettable snow blizzard during the trip.

"We experienced the equivalent of all four seasons trekking up the mountain," she said.

The professor also took some special souvenirs on her trip to the mountain's peak.

"My children gave me tokens to clip to my backpack – a K-State Wildcat and a monster from the children's book 'Where the Wild Things Are' by Maurice Sendak," Passarelli said. "The Wildcat made it to the summit of Kili."



Despite the volatile weather and physical strain, Passarelli said it was all worth it when she reached the top.

"Reaching the summit gave me a big sense of achievement," she said. "I can't describe how it feels when you make it there. It's a wonderful feeling that I will keep forever."

Though Passarelli has had the opportunity to travel and have other adventures, she said there was nothing like Mount Kilimanjaro.

"This was one of the most challenging, yet exciting, adventures that I have had," she said. "And I hope to be able to do it again."

Sophomore golfer Joe Ida said he hopes to use this year's strong performance as a stepping stone for next season. He was named the Big 12 Conference Golfer of the Month for October 2007, and his seven-under par 65 in the second round of the Pacific Invitational stands as the lowest par-72 score ever recorded by a Wildcat.

Experience has helped propel Wildcat golfer to success

By Justin Nutter
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Take a look back at life as a five-year-old. For many people, that was about the time their parents decided they were ready for organized sports. While several kids were being chauffeured to soccer or tee-ball practice every week, Joe Ida's case was a little different.

"I've been playing golf for a long time," said Ida, sophomore in pre-professional business administration and who is in his second year as a member of K-State's men's golf team. "My dad's a big golfer, and he really got me turned on to it when I was a little kid."

Coach Tim Norris echoed Ida's thoughts and said the bond Ida has with his father has helped make him the golfer he is today.

"Joe's dad is a very avid golfer," said Norris, who has coached Ida for the past two seasons. "They have a very healthy relationship golf-wise, and I'm sure that's been a big part of his success."

Ida, a native of Fort Scott, Kan., excelled as a golfer at Fort Scott High School. After placing seventh in the Class 4A state tournament his junior year, the four-year letterman captured the individual title as a senior. He said his experience helped him make the transition to college golf.

"My experience has definitely helped me a lot," he said. "It made the jump from high school to college much easier."

In his career as a Wildcat, Ida has had solid production on the golf course. His 2007-08 scoring average of 72.95 strokes per round is second only to fellow sophomore Mitchell Gregson (72.86). Ida boasts a team-leading four top-five finishes this season, highlighted by a career-best second-place finish in the Herb Wimberly Intercollegiate on Oct. 29 -30, 2007.

He was named the Big 12 Golfer of the Month for October 2007, and his seven-under par 65 in the second round of the Pacific Invitational stands as the lowest par-72 score ever recorded by a Wildcat.

Senior Kyle Yonke said Ida has been the backbone of the team this season as well as a fun guy to be around.

"He's really been someone the team can rely on every single week," said Yonke. "I actually live with him, and the guy is hilarious. Nobody on the team ever takes him seriously."

Ida said the team is a really tight-knit group.

"I spend a lot of time with my teammates," he said. "We're all really good friends. When we're not competing, we like to just wind down and hang out."

However, Ida has been all business on the course. He has already established himself as one of K-State's greatest career golfers. He ranks in the top-10 in multiple single season categories, including scoring average (fourth) and tournaments played (fifth), and he is on pace to set records for many career categories, including tournaments played, rounds played and stroke average. He also made significant contributions to a 2007-08 squad that set team records for scoring average and top-five finishes. Norris said Ida's love for golf has led to his consistent success.

"He has a strong passion for the game," he said. "Sometimes, you go through periods where you're not playing very well, but that passion will help you to battle your way out of it."

Ida said even though he's been successful, he's doing what he can to improve.

"I worked with an instructor last summer," he said. "That really helped me to improve the physical aspects of my game."

Experience has been a big part of Ida's success throughout his entire career, and he said college is no different. He said his experience with the 2006-07 squad helped him to step up as a leader this season.

"I was lucky enough to play in every event last year," he said. "That really helped me out this season."

The Wildcats will also count on Ida's leadership when they compete in the NCAA West Regional on May 15-17 at the Gold Mountain Golf Club in Bremerton, Wash.

Ida said he hopes to use this year's strong performance as a stepping stone for next season.

"Hopefully I can take what I've done this year and use it to improve my game in the future," he said.

Summer sporting events not limited

OWEN KENNEDY

A summer without baseball is like a summer without sunshine. Playing catch in the front yard, going to the batting cages and spending a day watching the Royals at Kauffman Stadium are the focal points of baseball season and summer. Watching the game at home on TV doesn't compare to being in the stadium and experiencing the atmosphere. But professional sporting events aren't cheap, and the cash required for the gas to get to Kansas City is a sizable amount.

For those living in Manhattan for the summer, or anywhere in the area, what is the best way to get a sports fix until football season? Manhattan isn't exactly a sports Mecca over the summer. But some cities in the area offer inexpensive sports entertainment to fill the void left by Michael Beasley and Jordy Nelson.

JUNCTION CITY

Surprisingly, Junction City is a hotbed of athletic activity during the dog days of summer. For those who would like to make the road trip to see the powder blue Royals, but don't have the gas or money, baseball can be found just a few minutes away on I-70. The Junction City Generals started their season on May 5, and play continues until late July. The Generals are a member of the Central Plains Baseball league and play in what was once called "the finest baseball stadium in Kansas." Rathert Stadium was completed in 1937 as a Works Progress Administration project during the Great Depression, according to the Generals' Web site. In addition to the regular slate of games, in which tickets are $5, the Generals will welcome fans to a free open practice on May 29.

If baseball doesn't quench your sports thirst, stay in Junction and check out the Junction City Tigers. The Tigers play in the

Wildcats upset high-ranked Sun Devils

Justin Bloxom takes a swing during the Wildcats' home game against Texas on April 6. Bloxom went 3-4, scored two runs and tallied five RBI in the upset victory of the No. 3 Arizona State Sun Devils in Tointon Family Stadium Tuesday night.

The K-State men's baseball team had a chance to upset a ranked team for the last time this season, and Wildcat first baseman Justin Bloxom made sure they were able to hold on to beat the No. 3-ranked Arizona State Sun Devils 7-6 on Tuesday night at Tointon Family Stadium.

The game didn't get off to a good start for the Wildcats as Arizona State lead-off man Ryan Sontag scorched a single up the middle. The Sun Devils' threat to score in the first was quickly relinquished as K-State's starting pitcher Justin Murray got Petey Paramore to ground into an inning-ending double play.

"Obviously we had to grind it out pretty good," Hill said. "That was a great offensive ball club, and Murray gave us a great start. That was a plus."

K-State (23-25) got its first hit when Nate Tenbrink connected on a two-out single, and the next batter, Bloxom, capitalized on the Wildcats' momentum with a opposite field two-run blast to take the lead. Rob Vaughn had a chance to add to the lead in the second with a man on third, but hit a harmless grounder to end the scoring threat.

Arizona State (37-9) got a lead-off walk in the fourth by Brett Wallace but once again, the Sun Devils were turned away empty handed. It was Bloxom coming up big again for the Wildcats as he took away an almost certain Sun Devils extra-base hit with a diving catch that brought the crowd to its feet. He then tagged the base for another double play, and Murray got out of the inning with a strike out of Rocky Laguna.

"Bloxom really kinda kicked things off for us," Hill said. "He had a pretty good

Coach Frank Martin announces signings of junior college recruits Awaji, Herrera

K-State basketball coach Frank Martin announced Tuesday the signing of junior college standouts Buchi Awaji and Abdul Herrera to National Letters of Intent.

Awaji comes to K-State after playing two seasons at Citrus College in Glendora, Calif., while Herrera played the past season at Hutchinson Community College in Hutchinson, Kan. The duo are the first players to sign with the Wildcats for the 2008-09 season.

"We are pleased to welcome the addition of Buchi and Abdul to our basketball program," Martin said. "Both add tremendous experience to the roster after having played at the Division I level in their basketball careers. They know what it takes to succeed at this level. Buchi is a scorer who was the best player on the best junior college team in the state of California, while Abdul brings us tremendous presence both offensively and defensively at the rim."

A 6-foot-3, 175-pound shooting guard from Los Angeles, Awaji helped the Fighting Owls to a 35-1 overall record and to their first-ever California Community College Athletic Association state championship in 2007-08. He was named the most valuable player of the state tournament after averaging 12.3 points, 8.7 rebounds and 2.3 assists during the team's three-game championship run. He collected double-doubles in the final two games, including 14 points, 11 rebounds and four assists in the 72-67 win over Fullerton in the title contest. He was named first team all-state and co-MVP of the Western State Conference South with teammate Darren Moore. He is rated as the No. 32 player in the junior college ranks by JucoJunction.com.

Awaji tallied 1,021 points during his two-year stint at Citrus, becoming the first player under head coach Rick Croy to top the 1,000-point plateau in a career. He connected on 48.8 percent (373-of-764) of his field goals in his two-year career, including 36.1 percent (103-of-285) from 3-point range.

Awaji transferred to Citrus College after redshirting his freshman season at Florida International in 2005-06. He played at Loyola High School in Los Angeles where he was named first team all-conference and team MVP as a senior.

A 6-foot-11, 260-pound power center from Panama City, Panama, Herrera comes to K-State after playing one year at Hutchinson Community College for head coach Ryan Swanson. He helped the Dragons to a 23-9 overall record and a second-place finish in the Western Division of the Jayhawk Conference in 2007-08.

Herrera averaged 6.3 points with team-best 62.5 percent shooting (70-of-112) for the Dragons this past season with 5.0 rebounds and 1.1 blocks in 12.9 minutes per game. He ranked second on the squad in blocks, third in rebounding and fifth in scoring. He scored in double figures in six contests, including a season-high 16 points against Dodge City Community College on Feb. 13.

Prior to transferring to Hutchinson, Herrera played one season at Division II South Carolina-Aiken in 2006-07 for head coach Vince Alexander. Though he saw action in just three games due to injury, he averaged 10.3 points on 38.7 percent shooting (12-of-31) for the Pacers with 7.3 rebounds in 24.0 minutes per game.

School board hoping to pass $99.2 million bond issue in fall

By Tyler Sharp
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Manhattan-Ogden Unified School District 383 could see several changes if a new bond issue passes in November.

USD 383 has not had a bond issue pass since 1993, which is why the district has a problem now, said board member Walt Pesaresi.

"Maintenance hasn't been taken care of over the last 30 years," he said. "We need to do it. Look at the Statehouse – it hadn't been kept up with and now they have to spend more money to do it, KU and K-State as well. Redoing our current buildings results in us getting so much more bang for our buck than building new."

The bond issue is directed at expanding capacity and dealing with maintenance issues. Growth at Fort Riley and in the local economy has increased student population in the district. During the past three years, the district has grown by more than 600 students, said Beth Tatarko, board president. She said the district estimates an increase of about 1,600 students during the next 10 years. Much of this growth has been at the elementary level, she said.

"We're currently at capacity in the elementary schools," Tatarko said. "We've got to create some additional space. A few years ago we had space to grow. Bluemont [Elementary School] had just opened, but now we're completely filled at the elementary level."

Tatarko said the process behind this bond issue has been a lengthy one. A facility-needs assessment for the district was initiated in June 2006. For the past six months, the board has been making presentations to different community organizations. These presentations will lead to a June 11 board vote on a resolution for the bond issue and what exactly it will include. An information campaign will precede the district-wide vote on November 4.

Since November 2007, the board has trimmed the bond issue's initial estimated cost of $128.7 million to a $99.2 million package with the possibility of two additional packages to be approved by voters. For the two optional packages, which include improvements in athletics and support for capacity and security, to pass, the main bond issue will have to gain the voters' approval, Pesaresi said.

One bond cut dealt with the removal of friable asbestos in the district's 13 schools. Only 50 percent will be removed, saving around $1.2 million, Pesaresi said. Another cut was cafeteria improvements to the four smaller elementary schools, cutting $3.6 million from the bond issue budget.

Improvements are expected to free up more time for physical education classes, Pesaresi said. In four elementary schools, a common room for Physical Education and lunch is shared, which reduces common room availability.

Other provisions of the bond issue include expanding Lee Elementary School. An additional 14 classrooms would be part of the $10.4 million that would go to the school as part of the priority-one budget.

Additional improvements on the elementary level would include adding central air conditioning systems to eight of the district's nine elementary schools.

The secondary school improvements take up a majority of the bond issue. Budgets for Manhattan High School's east and west campuses encompass $50.1 million of the $99.2 million.

Improvements to the campuses include building security and window replacement among others.

The west campus will also add 14 additional classrooms to facilitate larger enrollments district-wide.

District-wide school enhancements range from making offices compliant with the Americans with Disabilities Act in Theodore Roosevelt Elementary to replacing the plumbing systems at eight of the district's 13 schools. Ogden Elementary has to use bottled water because of plumbing issues, Pesaresi said.

Also, the art room at Ogden which is an old janitor's closet that is five square feet, and it would receive a much-needed expansion.

Most of the new improvements and enhancements would result in greater efficiency for the district's schools, Tatarko said.

"We spend about $1 million on utilities, and I hope we can get more bang for our buck," she said. "We'll be adding space but now there will be some savings from modernizing spaces."

The board does not have firm numbers from the bond adviser on tax increases if the bond issue passes, Tatarko said.

Preliminary estimates indicate 50 to 60 cents per day or about a $219 yearly property tax increase for a house with an assessed valuation of $200,000. Community members have given the board a variety of responses regarding the bond issue, Pesaresi said.

"We usually see two different reactions," Pesaresi said. "One, 'Why haven't you kept it up?' Two, 'It needs to be done.' There's a really interesting graph that shows if we had maxed out our capital outlay budget by law, we wouldn't be allowed to keep up with repairs. The budget has to have computers, furniture and buses in addition to maintenance. It's hard to have money to do these additional things."

The board is prepared if the bond issue does not pass, Tatarko said.

Members will examine which sections do not receive support and make a modified proposal that could go on the ballot as soon as April 2009, she said.

"A lot of the maintenance issues need to be taken care of because of issues with buildings," she said. "We have security upgrades that need to be made and we need to increase capacity. That projected growth in the elementary schools will move through the middle school and the high schools – - that's why we're talking about growth there."

Eisenhower Middle School, as with the other eight elementary schools in USD 383, are near student capacity. A $99.2 million bond package to provide funds for maintenance and expansion will be voted on by community members in November.

TO THE EDITOR

All voters responsible for current poor economic status

Editor,

In response to Marquis Clark's article regarding the economic troubles that we find ourselves in, he is right for the most part.

One of the key issues that is missing from the argument is that we all vote.

While it is easily understandable that one generation finds it easy to blame the others for the situation we are in as a nation, we are all ultimately responsible. Last time I checked, we all got to vote.

Everyone alive older than 18, who is a citizen, gets to vote.

The pool of voters spans several generations, and that puts us all to blame.

We, as a nation, tried – don't get us wrong. We elected Nancy Pelosi and the Democratic Congress in an effort to help fix things. Last time I checked, Congress approves of the President's budget.

Our Democratic House has done little to change from being the rubber stamp that Bush enjoyed during the Republican-led house.

I think we have all realized that things haven't gone flawlessly over the past seven years, and hindsight is 20/20.

We are all in this mess together.

Everyone supported this mess five years ago - I don't know why politicians try to deny it. Marquis proved that in today's technological age, it's hard to hide what happened or was said years ago – just ask Hillary.

We all find ourselves in the same boat, and we are going to have to work together to get ourselves out.

Study abroad can benefit all

Editor,

I would like to commend the Collegian staff for their coverage of international activities on campus this year. There have been excellent articles about international students, their contributions to campus life and the services that support them.

Study abroad can be a wonderful, life-changing experience, but only a small percentage of K-State students currently take advantage of this opportunity. While this percentage is growing, there are international experiences available to every student here on the campus just by getting to know a classmate from another country.

My thanks to the Collegian for highlighting this important dimension of the K-State community.

Faculty members offer advice, tips for new bloggers

By Adrianne DeWeese
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The need for personal diaries in notebook format or weekly updates in an organization's newsletter is obsolete – enter the Weblog.

The Weblog, or blog for short, is a personal journal consisting of short news updates and commentary supplemented with links to other blogs and Web sites, according to Robert I. Berkman and Christopher A. Shumway's 2003 book "Digital Dilemmas: Ethical Issues for Online Media Professionals."

Some bloggers focus on computer technology, politics or the news media; others construct personal diary entries, publish original poems or upload multimedia files – it all depends on the blogger, according to "Digital Dilemmas."

Two K-State faculty members offered their advice for students on starting – and maintaining – a blog.

WHO SHOULD BLOG

People who start blogs are those who have socially valuable information to share with others on a regular basis, said Shalin Hai-Jew, instructional designer for K-State's Office of Mediated Education. Ideally, the information should be new, original and first-hand, Hai-Jew said.

"I think students from different countries and cultures would be great bloggers because they could then introduce their own cultures and points of view," Hai-Jew said.

The advantages of blogs include creating a permanent archive of information that is also searchable, said Donna Ekart, digital resources librarian with the Digital Initiatives department.

"It makes it more accessible to more people, and it's accessible from anywhere, unlike paper copies," Ekart said.

Student organizations can post information about future meetings and events and also post minutes from meetings on blogs, Ekart said.

"It's simpler than e-mail, too, because people can see the information and comment on it right back and everyone can see everyone's comments," Ekart said.

Hai-Jew started the blog Instructional Design Open Studio two years ago when she came to K-State from Shoreline Community College in Shoreline, Wash. The Office of Mediated Education sponsors the blog, which collects insight on instructional design and its ever-changing technologies and strategies, she said.

She said she blogs during her lunch hours or on weekends, and it usually doesn't take her much time. She also is soliciting chapter proposals for the book "Digital Imagery and Informational Graphics in E-Learning: Maximizing Visual Technologies."

"It's a way for me to mentally process information, so it's not really anything extra," Hai-Jew said. "The blog allows me to build a community on the Web around a certain topic. People from around the world will post messages and responses, so it's really collaborative."

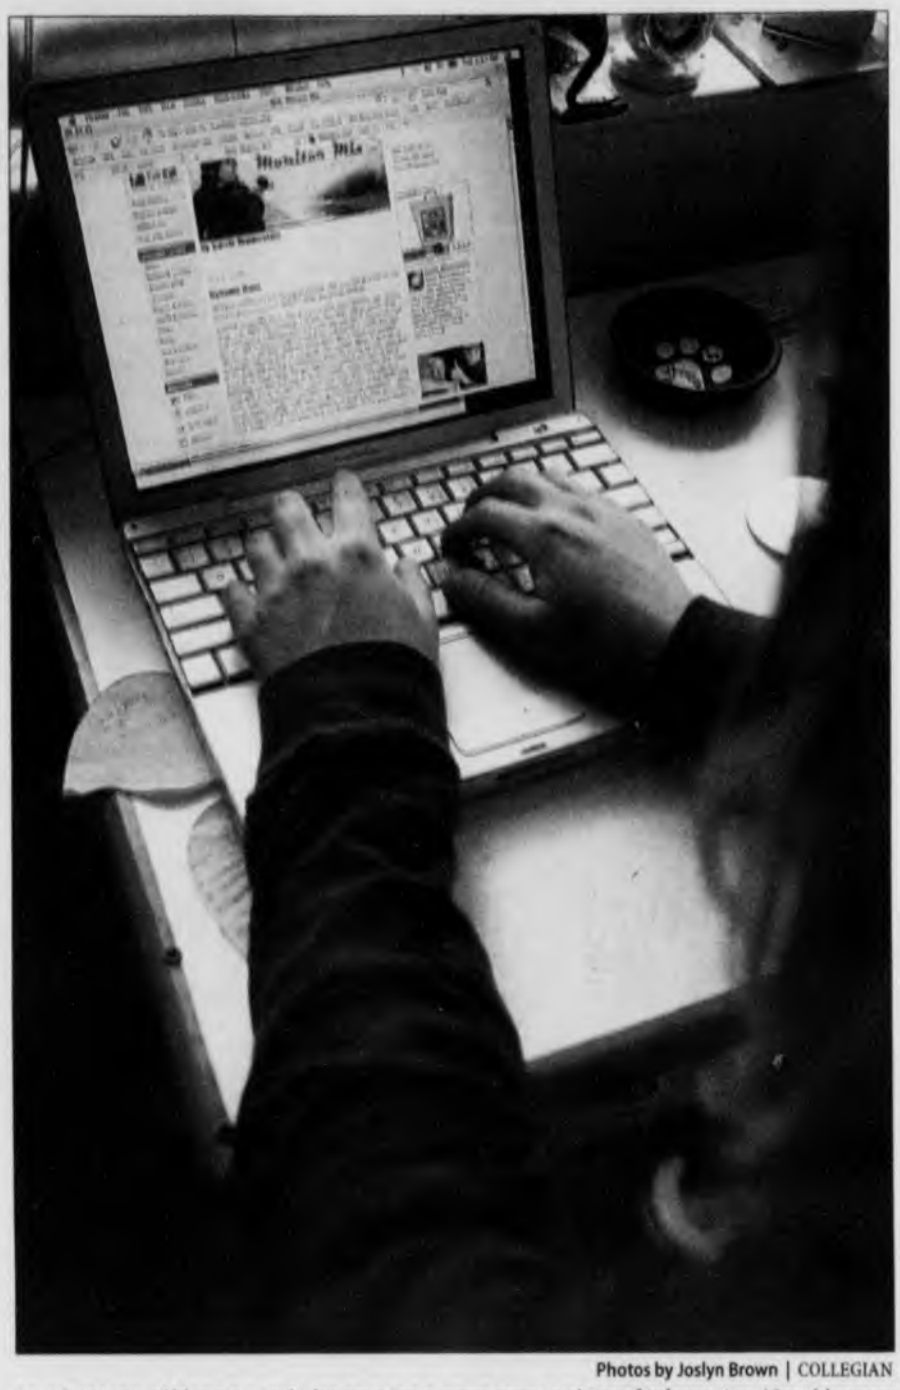
CHOOSING A SITE

Sites like www.blogger.com and www.blogsome.com allow bloggers to start their own blogs for free with different design and WordPress themes. Hai-Jew said selecting a site depends on the site's policies, copyright for materials and the site's interface.

"It helps to read the fine print, because these different companies change their policies," she said. "People really need to be diligent before they select these third-party blog sites."

WHAT AND WHEN TO BLOG

Hai-Jew said the following are key elements for a blog: timeliness, relevance, newsworthiness, originality, voice, brevity, substance, thoughtfulness, logic and personality.



With timeliness, Hai-Jew said bloggers should post when they have substantial information, but they shouldn't wait too long in between their posts.

"There are blogs where people haven't written for months, and that's problematic," she said. "They should be writing in some different form, then, because blogs require some maintenance."

Blogs also should not serve as a selfish endeavor because they will lose readers' interest in a short time, Hai-Jew said. On the IDOS blog, Hai-Jew posts under the pseudonym Eruditio Loginquitas, which is Latin for "learning distance" or "learning remoteness."

"It's not so much about me; it is about my interests, but it's about giving the limelight to other people," said Hai-Jew, who often incorporates outside interviews and question-and-answer sessions on the blog. "It is a pas

An advantage of blogging includes creating a permanent archive of information. Most bloggers focus on a specific topic to constantly write about.

BLOG GLOSSARY

— Blog: Short for weblog, a Web site that is updated regularly with posts, typically in reverse-chronological order. The main body of a blog generally consists of posts and comments, with links and other information found in the left or right sidebars.

— Blogger: Someone who maintains a blog; also a Google-owned service at www.blogger.com that offers free blogs to anyone.

— Comment: A response or rebuttal to a post on a blog.

— Feed: Also known as RSS, the posts on a blog, tidily wrapped in XML, which can be read through a feedreader or integrated into other Internet-based pages.

— Feedreader: A program or service that can "read" RSS feeds from blogs and display them; examples of online services that do this are My Yahoo, Google homepage and Bloglines.

— Post: The main content of a blog. Generally, only the owner and invited authors can post on a blog; others may only comment where permitted. Posts typically have a date header and are followed by other links, such as permanent links, a category listing and a link to the comment function.

— RSS: Stands for either RDF Site Summary, Rich Site Summary or Really Simple Syndication; the last definition is the most helpful. It is a helpful way to syndicate a blog because it allows users to read it when and where they want.

— XML: Stands for aeXtensible Markup Language, which is coding language that allows users to take any content, enclose it in HTML-like open and closing tags and utilize it in different ways.

Easy snacks for finals week important during time of stress

BRETT KING

You wake up and realize your final is in 30 minutes. Rushing around and starting to panic, you realize there is no time for food before taking the final for which you studied so hard.

Last week, I shared a few recipes for a quick and easy meal that will keep through the week. Students are stressed during finals week and sometimes eating takes a back seat to caffeine, nicotine and a lack of sleep. However, it is important to eat properly and maintain energy and awareness.

This week, I again offer two quick and easy recipes that students can eat on the go between finals.

BACON STICKS

2 boxes of thin breadsticks, flavored
1 pound of peppered bacon
Freshly grated parmesan cheese

Preheat oven to 350 degrees; open box of breadsticks and throw out any broken breadsticks. Open package of bacon and wrap each breadstick in one piece of bacon. Place each breadstick with bacon on a foil-covered baking sheet.

Place in the oven and cook for 12 minutes at 350 degrees. Once cooked, grate parmesan cheese over the breadsticks. These can be eaten either cold or hot on the way to class.

CHICKEN QUESADILLAS

2 boneless chicken breasts, diced
3 tablespoons fresh lime juice, divided
¾ cup red onion, minced
¼ cup cilantro, roughly chopped
2/3 cup whole kernel corn, drained
1 jalapeno pepper, seeded and minced
1 (15-ounce) can black beans, drained
¾ cup shredded Monterey Jack cheese
6 (10-inch) flour tortillas
Cooking spray
1/2 cup avocado, peeled and diced*
1/2 cup sour cream*
1/8 teaspoon of salt*
* optional

Grill chicken breast and cut into small chunks and set aside. Combine two tablespoons of lime juice, onion, cilantro, corn, jalapeno, black beans and grilled chicken into a large bowl, mixing the ingredients together.

Divide half of the cheese evenly among three tortillas. Put one-third cup of vegetable and chicken mixture on each tortilla. Sprinkle the remaining cheese over mixture and top with another tortilla.

Heat a large nonstick skillet over medium-high heat. Coat pan with cooking spray and place one quesadilla in pan and cook for four minutes on each side. Repeat for each quesadilla and cut each into sixths.

If a dip is desired, combine avocado, sour cream and salt together with the remaining tablespoon of lime juice. Stir together and serve with the quesadillas.

COLDPLAY SINGLE GETS 2 MILLION DOWNLOADS

Coldplay's new single "Violet Hill" is now available commercially through regular digital outlets. For the past week it has been available free only through coldplay.com

In the past 7 days the single has been downloaded for free by a staggering 2 million people, meaning that it would have outsold the combined Top 40 singles in the chart four times over last week.

The group's new album "Viva La Vida or Death And All His Friends" is released on June 12.

ASHLEE SIMPSON VOWS NEVER TO GO OFF THE RAILS

The singer — who recently announced her engagement to Fall Out Boy rocker Pete Wentz — won't follow in the footsteps of troubled stars Britney Spears and Lindsay Lohan because she is in control of her life.

She said: "I don't see myself ever following the path those girls take. I'm almost 24. I'm pretty together and I'm getting married. I wouldn't ever let myself get that way, and I don't surround myself with yes-people. I think that's the most important thing.

"People don't control me or anything I do, and I've never had that problem." Ashlee — whose older sister is pop singer Jessica — says her relationship with Pete helps keep her grounded. She added to Britain's Daily Star newspaper: "Pete is my support system. We definitely give honest opinions of each other. I love his music, and he's so supportive of everything I do."

Meanwhile, Ashlee has revealed she loved working with producer Timbaland on her new single "Outta My Head (Ay Ay Ay)".

She said: "It was so cool to work with Timbaland but it was important for the end result not to sound like one of his tracks. He really got me and who I am as a person, so the music still has this rock element going on, but with an 80s sound.

"I'd never worked with anyone who'd done beats. But I was like, 'Ah, I really like this world.' And who better to go to than Timbaland. It was random but a very cool collaboration."

Business fraternity promotes networking, social events at K-State, across country

By Salena Strate
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Every other Thursday night, a group of business and economics majors meet to hear business professionals speak about their worlds. Alpha Kappa Psi, a co-ed business fraternity, educates its members in areas of social activities, networking and friends.

"I joined for leadership opportunities in the College of Business and to meet other business majors," said Anne Kelly, sophomore in accounting.

Kelly said she encourages all business and economics majors to apply to join. New members must have a 2.5 GPA in their second semester of college to be initiated by Alpha Kappa Psi. New members experience a preparatory program and weekly tests to gain knowledge of their founders.

"The amount of hard work that goes into this group is incredible," said Kayla Dierks, senior in business marketing and Alpha Kappa Psi alumna. "The exec members are always there to help out, and this was the hardest part of going alum."

Dierks joined in fall 2005. She said she wanted to get involved to network. At the group's meetings, she said members give reports and discuss business issues. She also said the professional development chair invites alumni and friends of alumni to come speak to the group.

"When the professionals come to speak to us, Alpha Kappa Psi will take them out to dinner," she said. "They also get a CD with all the member's résumés on it."

During the spring semester, the group travels to Chicago to participate in the Success Institute. This is their regional conference and the K-State chapter of Alpha Kappa Psi has been voted No. 1 for the past two years. Members also participate in Up 'Til Dawn, Relay for Life and the memorial volleyball tournament known as "Beach Bash."

"We exceeded our goal to get 10 teams in the tournament," Dierks said. "It went really well and we raised more than $350 for Rebecca Trible's scholarship fund."

On April 27, Alpha Kappa Psi had their all-university volleyball tournament to honor Rebecca Trible, who died in a car accident one year ago. She was an active member of Alpha Kappa Psi before her tragic death, Dierks said. The event, which had 15 registered teams, was at City Park. First place players received $100 and the second place team received $50, which they donated back to the fund.

"The whole reason we are doing this is to set up a scholarship," Megan Niehues, junior in human resource management and Alpha Kappa Psi member said. "Rebecca was always outgoing and it's something we really want to promote – what Rebecca brought to us. It's the attitudes like Rebecca's that we all loved."

Past grad classes share tradition

By Elise Podhajsky
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The following article explains the history behind a long lost K-State graduating-class tradition – the passing, stealing and hiding of a shepherd's crook with each class's graduating year attached – it was published in the April 8, 1938, Collegian.

ROYAL PURPLE FILE PHOTO

A shepherd's crook displays the numerals of past graduating classes. The crook, which has fallen out of favor, started in 1898 and was passed down from class to class.

SHEPHERD'S CROOK RITE A 40-YEAR CUSTOM

When the senior class of 1938 presents the Shepherd's Crook to the class of 1939 April 18, they will be carrying on a 40-year custom, for it was in 1898 that the crook came into being.

The history behind the crook goes back even further. As a memorial to their class, the class of 1892 planted an ivy vine just north of the entrance to Anderson Hall. George L. Clothier, an agriculture student, conceived the idea of presenting the spade, which he used, to the class of '93 with appropriate ceremonies.

The class of '93 designated this spade as a symbol of work and displayed it in a case in Anderson Hall. They never were able to put their numeral on it, though, for it was stolen by the class of 1894. When the class of '95 received the spade, they refused to pass it on but, so tradition says, buried it in the Blue river.

FIRST CROOK IN '98

Remembering the tradition of the spade, the class of '98 presented a crook with a ribbon bearing their class numeral to the succeeding class at the Junior-Senior Prom.

It was passed on the next year, but the class of 1900 refused to receive it. Appropriately enough, a piece of crepe now bears the "00" of this class.

In the following decade, most of the traditional history of the crook was made. It became the object of sophomore classes to try by any means to prevent the junior class from receiving the crook and placing their numerals on it. Fierce class rivalries grew out of the custom. At one time it was buried in the depot of the Blue Valley railroad and never found by the class of 1908. In summer 1909, the crook was in a barn in Wabaunsee County and the ribbons were sewed in a cushion.

SECRECY PREVAILED

Each year the process was repeated. Greatest secrecy surrounded those who had custody of the crook during the year. Students' trunks, local bank vaults, Wamego and Junction City all were its hiding places. The task of pressing the ribbons before the prom each year was done at great risk of surprise by the sophomores.

One class ingenuously rigged up a series of pulleys and wires to pull the crook from the gym to the attic of Calvin Hall during a moment when the lights were out to keep possession of it.

Another group followed the car in which Dean Van Zile was riding home from the dance, suspecting her of being the custodian.

If a member of the class of 1940 should make away with the crook before April 18, historical precedent would be with them.

CAUTIONS WHILE POSTING AND READING BLOGS

When disseminating information, Hai-Jew said bloggers should avoid libel, defamation and plagiarism. Bloggers also should avoid making angry posts in the heat of the moment about a topic or subject, she said.

Automated spam bots also can flood blog sites with unwanted messages as responses to blog posts, Hai-Jew also said.

While reading other people's blogs, Hai-Jaw said viewers should validate the information and its truth. According to "Digital Dilemmas," Rebecca Blood, author of "The Weblog Handbook," said it is unrealistic to expect all bloggers to present an "even-handed picture" of the world, though they should be forthcoming about their sources, biases and behaviors.

"You've got to vet every piece of information you come across for truth," Hai-Jew said. "I would say that applies to blogs because they often are just opinion."

City library hosts Super Smash tournament

By Michael Champlin
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Manhattan Public Library appealed to the younger crowd in the community, sponsoring a Nintendo "Super Smash Brothers Brawl" tournament Tuesday night.

Twelve contestants participated in the adult division of the tournament, which took place in the library's auditorium and was open to the public. The teen division was played earlier in the day with a total of 16 participants.

Tyrel Willimon, freshman in pre-psychology, won the adult division choosing to fight with the character Lucas. Lucas is a character that first appeared in Nintendo's Earthbound 2 and has similar fighting techniques to another character, Nes.

"I started with Nes, but started playing with Lucas because he has better aerial moves." said Willimon.

Willimon said he lives in Smith Scholarship House and enjoys playing video games with the other residents in the house, even though he humbly admitted, "Not many people want to play with me."

Royce Kitts, reference librarian at Manhattan Public Library, organized the event and said he was happy with the turnout. This is the third video game tournament the library has sponsored. The first was a Guitar Hero tournament that took place in February, followed by a Wii Sports tournament for elementary children. Kitts said the purpose of these events is to bring visitors into the library who would not normally visit and to give them a sample of the services the library has to offer.

The library plans to have a tournament every three months. The next will be in July and contestants will play Sonic and Mario at the Wii Olympic Games.

"We try and pick games that are popular and people enjoy playing [with large groups]," Kitts said. "I think these events are showing signs of success - we had a total of 28 people show to this one, and it's great to get the teenagers, who are normally here after school, involved."

The program is just beginning and the library staff will be watching to see if hosting video game events is worth the relatively high cost of equipment.

Central Plains Football League along with seven other teams from Kansas and Missouri. The CPFL is an eight-man football league in which teams play by arena football-like rules, sometimes inside, sometimes out. The Tigers' games are affordable, so take a date if your significant other enjoys sports; if not, try a man date. Adult tickets are only $4 and a military ID will get you in for $1.

TOPEKA

If the CPFL sounds exciting, take a trip east and cheer on the Topeka team, the Savage. The Savage will play the Tigers on May 17, so if you're still coherent after finals week, visit the Capitol Building and then check out these two teams.

For some, small leagues and small teams just don't meet the sports standard, and for those people, there are the Kansas Koyotes. The Topeka-based American Professional Football League team plays indoor football at Landon Arena, and the team was undefeated in 2003 and 2004, winning the APFL championship in 2007. The Koyotes started the season in April and will play until sometime in July, depending on playoff performances. Tickets are reasonable, from $10 to $45, according to the team Web site.

So don't fret if you can't make it to Kansas City, as there is no shortage of sports in the Manhattan area. Luckily, we won't have to wait long until more pro sports teams settle the prairie.

Owen Kennedy will hopefully graduate in December, accomplishing his goal of graduating in 2008 — with 2 weeks to spare. Please send comments to sports@spub.ksu.edu.

ATTEMPTED HOMICIDE | Riley County Police believe alcohol involved in stabbing incident

930 Kearney St. When officers arrived, they found Robert Gantt, 25, in the bed of a pickup truck bleeding profusely from a life-threatening neck wound, Moldrup said. RCPD officers also found Patrick Wentz, a resident of the same address, with a cut to his hand.

Police officers recovered the knife believed to be used for the injuries to Gantt and Wentz.

After a preliminary investigation, officers identified Patrick McGraw, 52, Sabetha, Kan., as the suspect. McGraw was arrested for attempted murder in the second degree and aggravated battery. His bond was set at $100,000, and he remained confined at presstime.

Both victims were transported to Mercy. Gantt's current condition was unknown at presstime, and Wentz was treated and released.

The victims and the suspect knew each other as coworkers at Knudson Construction, 930 Kearney St., according to the report. Moldrup said the altercation between the victims and the suspect began inside the Kearney residence. Moldrup also said police believe alcohol was involved, but there was no evidence drugs were involved.

night, and he took good swings."

The Sun Devils took the lead in the next two innings with a crushing homer by Mike Leake in the fifth and a two out, bases loaded two-RBI single in the sixth off the bat of Sontag.

The Wildcats wouldn't stop fighting as they came back in the bottom of the inning when Brett Scott scored from a single by Tenbrink. Bloxom came up later in the inning and blasted another two-run bomb over the left centerfield wall.

Bloxom added another RBI in the following inning with a triple. He finished the game going 3-for-4 with five RBI.

"Of course there was extra motivation for my hometown man," Bloxom said. "I'm just trying to hit the ball."

The drama wasn't over as Arizona State came back in the top of the eighth and added three runs on four hits, cutting the lead to one. The Wildcats were unable to add an insurance run for the ninth, but Daniel Edwards came in and closed the door – earning his ninth save of the season.

NBAF | Many in community skeptical of facility medicine division at the U.S. Army Medical Research Institute of Infectious Diseases at Fort Detrick in Frederick, Md.

"The facility was located on Plum Island in the 1950s when biocontainment wasn't even an idea," Jaax said. "That was a form of trying to limit any potential movement of disease and the thought was there because you had an island that you would be able to control, and I think that there certainly is a factor associated with that if you don't have a facility that is designed to work with contagious organisms."

RESEARCH OPPORTUNITIES

Scientifically, Conrad said it does not make sense to have NBAF located near K-State's campus. Instead, he said the facility should be built 20-50 miles away from K-State "in the middle of nowhere."

"They could still have K-State and KU and KU Med Center scientists go there for periods of time to do research," he said. "They could invite people from other countries to come and do research. We do that now - we invite them here to campus, but we could just as easily invite to other places."

At NBAF, between 250-350 employees would work as researchers, technical support and operations specialists, according to Homeland Security's Web site. Conrad said though 50 miles might seem like a long distance for a work commute, he knows K-State faculty members who travel from Topeka to Manhattan each day for work.

"Why does it have to be so close to something? Why can't it be 50 miles away?" Conrad said about the NBAF's location. "I would say, at least, it ought to be 20 miles away, but I would say more – but at least 20 miles away from any populated area and 50 miles away from feedlots that might potentially be downwind."

During his 37 years at K-State, Conrad said he has traveled with his family during most summers to a marine biology lab in Maine. If funding permits, Conrad said he also takes undergraduate and graduate students and postdoctoral fellows with him.

"So, the whole business of going even 2,000 miles to do research on an annual basis is a regular part of normal, modern business of doing scientific, biological research," he said.

Homeland Security and the U.S. Department of Agriculture have defined the following diseases as possible areas for study at the NBAF: foot-and-mouth disease, classical swine fever, African swine fever, Rift Valley fever, contagious bovine pleuropneumonia, Japanese encephalitis virus, nipah virus and hendra virus. Descriptions of these diseases are available at www.dhs.gov/xres/labs/gc_1187971300993.shtm.

Jaax said it is almost irrelevant that such facilities are located on an island.

"These facilities are designed to operate with these kinds of agents," he said. "That's why they're so expensive; that's why there's so much oversight associated with them. I don't view – having worked in a facility where they worked with the worst of the agents – that that particular capability to have this tremendous separation doesn't really make any appreciable difference, in my view."

COMMUNITY MEMBERS' CONCERNS

In a February interview, Ron Trewyn, K-State's vice president of research, and Jaax both said they had not seen a large number of community members express opposition for the NBAF.

"Looking at just what we see from newspapers and other media outlets, I would say our public support here is very strong in comparison to several of the other sites," Jaax said. "I think we're not the only one who has strong community support, but certainly ours is as strong as any."

However, Conrad said he has spoke with Manhattan community members who are afraid to speak against Manhattan as a proposed NBAF site.

"I do know there are people who are concerned," Conrad said. "With respect to this lab, there are normal people who are afraid to speak out because they feel that this is such a big thing – so much money involved, so many powerful political people involved – that they would lose their jobs.

"If there was some way by which people could express opinions in an anonymous way, I think there would be no shortage of negative opinions, on the basis of what I've heard so far."

Trewyn shook his head when asked for a response to people's concerns about losing their jobs if they spoke in opposition of NBAF.

"No one would lose a job for speaking their opinion on any matter," Trewyn said. "There's a long history of people speaking out on issues. It's not something that should be any concern."

Public meetings have taken place on and off K-State's campus, during which community members could have provided their comments about the NBAF, Trewyn said.

"There have been ample opportunities over the last two years to speak about NBAF," he said. "Prior to that, we had numerous public meetings concerning the Biosecurity Research Institute, which is a very similar type of facility. So, these conversations have been going on at the university and in the community for four to five years now."

PAST ERRORS

Plum Island Animal Disease Center's Web page states, "We're equally proud of our safety record. Not once in our nearly 50 years of operation has an animal pathogen escaped from the island."

According to a Dec. 20, 2002, article in the New York Times, a three-hour power failure at the Plum Island Animal Disease Center during a December 2002 weekend renewed concerns about the center's safety. On Dec. 19, 2002, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, D-N.Y., called for the center to cease all operations until an independent safety review could be conducted.

As a scientist, Conrad said his research does not involve pathogenic organisms, but he deals with similar lab equipment that the NBAF could contain.

"It's not perfect. We could buy brand-new equipment, train people and it will not be perfect - mistakes will happen," Conrad said. "The problem is that when you're dealing with organisms as pathogenic as foot-and-mouth disease, one mistake is all it takes. So, that's why real isolation – I think particularly away from livestock – is wise."

Trewyn has a different perspective, though.

"With modern facilities, there's basically no evidence that these pathogens get out of these types of facilities," Trewyn said. "They have had the most infectious diseases for humans worked on in facilities in the middle of Atlanta and Frederick, Md., with no escape. There's little difference, in this case. The technology is such in this day and age that these diseases can be worked on anywhere."

In late summer 2007, British Prime Minister Gordon Brown ordered an investigation into two British laboratory facilities. According to an Aug. 7, 2007, article in the New York Times, the British government's Health and Safety Executive report found that the spread of foot-and-mouth disease among livestock at two farms in southern English was "probably caused by human movement from nearby laboratory facilities that was either 'accidental or deliberate.'"

"To me, that's a heads-up lesson about what could happen," Conrad said regarding the 2007 incident. "But here, it would happen on a 10-fold greater scale with economic impact that would potentially be very large."

The NBAF Environmental Impact Statement draft for each of the six proposed sites will be released sometime this month. A 60-day comment period will follow the release of the draft. The statement itself will not serve as the deciding factor on whether NBAF should be built or its location.

FUNDS | Administrator says funds used right

president for administration and finance, authored the letter.

"NBAF will be a federal facility with no university funds utilized in support of NBAF," Trewyn said during an interview on Tuesday.

Trewyn said the university has appropriately used indirect cost funds when asked if he was aware of indirect funds being used toward the BRI.

"The indirect costs, the facility's administrative costs that are recovered on grants, are used for many purposes on campus," he said. "They, in fact, are costs associated with doing research – that's why they're on the projects, and they get used to support numerous institutional activities."

The Division of Financial Advisory Services is a centralized office that supports the NIH's Office of the Director; contracts, grants and program officials of NIH's Institutes and Centers; and business management officials of NIH's contractors and grantees.

According to the Division of Financial Advisory Services, a direct cost is any cost that can be easily identified with a specific project, grant or contact. Examples of a direct cost include salaries and wages, materials and supplies, subcontracts and consultants.

The division defines an indirect cost as any cost that cannot be easily identified or it would not be cost effective to identify to a specific project, but identified with two or more final cost objectives.

have problems with math and calculus. She said in her experience, students have told her math is their toughest subject.

BSU Webmaster Jonathan Scott also said the study sessions help him fit studying into his already busy schedule.

"It's good that we have it at the beginning of the week – it makes academics more of a priority," he said.

Carmen Ellis, senior in elementary education, said she thinks the study sessions have been beneficial to her learning.

"This is a very proactive environment where people can come to enhance their learning," she said. "It provides unity for black students to come to campus, work together and excel together."

Rhondalyn Peairs, director of the DOW Multicultural Resource Center and acting supervisor for the BSU study sessions, said she believes these study sessions provide the optimal environment for students.

"Bringing the students together in a formalized way where resources are readily available makes the studying experience better," she said.

While these study sessions are sponsored by BSU, Williams said he encourages non-members to join the group next year.

"Non-BSU members are welcome to come out," he said. "BSU is not just for blacks."

Soldier sues Army, says they didn't protect religious rights

By Scott Girard
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A Fort Riley soldier has sued the U.S. Army, claiming his right to religious freedom was infringed during his service in Iraq last year.

Jeremy Hall, 23, claims that he was abused and harassed because he is an atheist.

According to the Associated Press, Hall filed a federal lawsuit in Kansas City, Kan., on Sept. 18, 2007. Later in the year, the Army sent him to Fort Riley because they could not protect him from future attacks.

Pedro Irigonegaray, Topeka, is one of Hall's attorneys and said the plaintiffs are "ready to proceed with the legal process," which he said meant reviewing answers from the defendants, which they have not received, before the case goes to trial.

Irigonegaray said the the suit claims that the military failed to follow guidelines of equal treatment under the law by ignoring the mandate of the Establishment Clause of the U.S. Constitution.

"Freedom of religion also includes freedom from religion, and the military must not be permitted to choose a faith and have that faith mandatorily presented to a soldier," Irigonegaray said.

"Because the Constitution demands that in order for us to be free, the law must be enforced. If one of us is unequal, we are all less equal.

According to the New York Times, Hall's case is one of many over the past few years that have raised questions about the military's religious policies, which lean heavily toward Christianity, and possible proselytizing, or converting people to a certain religion, of several non-Christian soldiers.

In an April 26 Associated Press article, Hall said it was "just about time somebody said something."

Irigonegaray said Hall was courageous for filing the lawsuit and trying to change the practice of religious intolerance.

"What he hopes to gain by this is a reversal of the practice, pattern and policies that presently permit the proselytizing of soldiers and to allow each soldier his or her own faith or lack there of without interference," Irigonegaray said.

Fort Riley declined to comment on the specifics of the Hall case but released the following statement:

"Fort Riley fully supports the Army's policy on religious accommodation. The Army places a high value on the rights of its soldiers to observe tenets of their respective religious faiths or to practice no religion at all. The Army policy is to accommodate religious practices unless accommodation will have an adverse impact on unit readiness, individual readiness, unit cohesion, morale, discipline, safety and/or health.

"In accordance with Army policy, Fort Riley is committed to ensuring the rights of all its soldiers are protected, including those of Specialist Hall."

Vote to override coal plant veto fails

By Mark Savoy
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Gov. Kathleen Sebelius vetoed legislation March 21 that would have allowed Sunflower Electric Power Corporation to build two coal-based power plants in Holcomb, Kan.

SEBELIUS

Members of the Kansas Legislature supporting Sunflower Electric moved to quickly gather support against Sebelius' veto but failed to override her veto by four votes. The vote, 80-45, was not enough to override Sebelius' veto, which required 84 supporting votes to overturn.

On March 22, the Associated Press quoted Kansas Speaker of the House Melvin Neufeld as saying, "The people of Kansas expect – and they need – affordable electricity, and so we'll be working to make sure that happens."

The first sign of conflict came on Oct. 18, 2007, when Kansas Department of Health and Environment Secretary Roderick Bremby denied permits for the two 700 megawatt coal-burning plants.

"I believe it would be irresponsible to ignore emerging information about the contribution of carbon dioxide and other greenhouse gases to climate change and the potential harm to our environment and health if we do nothing," Bremby said in a news release.

This created tension between Bremby and representatives from western Kansas. Rep. Sydney Carlin, D-Manhattan, said Senate Bill 148 was written in a way that would have taken powers away from the secretary of Health and Environment.

She also noted the bill takes Sunflower out of the jurisdiction of the Kansas Corporation Commission, which has the responsibility to ensure electricity, natural gas, telephone and transportation vendors provide safe dependable services at low costs to the residents of Kansas.

"People don't understand the language; the way the bill is written does not take powers away [from Bremby]," said Sherrine Jones-Sontag, Director of Communication and Caucus Information for Neufeld. "It states what [Secretaries of Health and Environment] can and cannot do. It forces him to stay within the statutes in place in both state and federal level."

She said Bremby's justifications for denying the permits to Sunflower were weak

Willard to receive largest amount of maintenance

By Adrianne DeWeese
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Willard Hall might be almost 70 years old, but for Department of Art students and faculty, the building might seem somewhat new after the completion of several deferred maintenance projects.

Because K-State received $5.1 million for Willard Hall deferred-maintenance projects in 2007, the entire art department will relocate in Willard, said Dave DeBusman, project coordinator for facility planning with K-State's Division of Facilities.

Construction for Willard started in 1937 and it opened in 1939 at a cost of $435,000; the building was remodeled in 1965.

"I think that what we're doing is that the building will approach meeting new codes – it's never going to meet new construction because it's so old," DeBusman said.

The ceramics and sculpture sections will relocate to Willard's lower level, he said. For ceramics, DeBusman said facilities will add new kilns or move existing kilns from West Stadium to Willard.

Fire and safety improvements also will take place throughout the building. According to a Board of Regents September 2007 release, the building's fire-alarm system needs upgraded and expanded, and all three stair towers need to be made fire-code compliant.

"They have not met them for years," DeBusman said about fire and safety codes. "Some of what we will be working on are original to the building."

K-State received more than $12.5 million of the more than $38 million that state universities received for 50 deferred maintenance projects. In June 2007, the Kansas Board of Regents formally approved five-year maintenance project plans for the six state universities. Willard received the most money of K-State's five projects.

The five-year infrastructure funding plan, signed into law during the 2007 Kansas legislative session, provided $90 million in direct state funds and about $44 million in retained-interest earning to the Regents' universities. It also provided up to $158 million in private contributions generated though state-funded tax

Alumni Association gives 4 awards, celebrates multicultural graduates

By Sarah Burford
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State Alumni Association had a reception Wednesday evening for multicultural students who are graduating in 2008.

Most of the students in attendance were first-generation college graduates, said Brandon Clark, coordinator for multicultural programs for the association.

"This is certainly something you should be proud of, and we are proud of you," Clark told the students. "This is our small way of being one of the first to congratulate you."

Clark said the Alumni Association began hosting the event in 1993. About 90 multicultural students, including students with traditionally minority ethnic and racial backgrounds and international students, have attended each year.

Myra Gordon, associate provost for diversity and dual career development, expressed her appreciation for the students with the "Three T's" during her speech. Time, talent and treasure were all ways the university has benefitted from the students' presence, she said.

"You're so smart, so visionary, so much better than some of us were at your age," Gordon said to the students, regarding their talent.

She encouraged them to reflect on the time the university has invested in them.

"We'll miss you, and we love you," Gordon said through tears.

Four students received Multicultural Senior Leadership Awards. The winners were Clemente Jaquez-Herrera, Samuel Ornelas, Bryon Williams and AbdulRasak Yahaya. Yahaya, senior in civil engineering, said he was born in Nigeria and moved to the United States with his family when he was young.

"Education is very important to my family because my dad traveled to the U.S. on a grant to continue his education. He is also a civil engineer," Yahaya said.

The leadership award, he said, is given to students who are "enhancing the knowledge of multicultural activities" and making multicultural students feel comfortable at K-State.

"Going to a predominantly white university can be overwhelming," Yahaya said.

And yet, Yahaya managed to be involved in several activities on campus, including Alpha Phi Alpha and Black Student Government.

Michael Riley, senior in political science, said he was the first in his family to graduate from college. Before his senior year in high school, he had not expected to attend a university.

"[My parents] are very amazed and proud of my accomplishment," Riley said.

NON-STICK CHEWING GUM FIRM RAISES $20 MILLION

LONDON – A British company developing a non-stick chewing gum that can be easily removed from pavements and shoes has raised 10 million pounds ($20 million) to help bring its product to market.

The new financing comes from institutional and private investors, with IP Group – an early backer – chipping in an additional 800,000 pounds, the firm said on Wednesday.

Revolymer's new Clean Gum is the result of polymer research at the University of Bristol, where the company was created as a research spin-out in 2005.

Today's chewing gums are made from synthetic latex, which is resistant to the weather and is strongly adhesive. Clean Gum adds a special polymer to modify its properties, making it far less sticky.

GAS PRICE PROTEST SINGER ARRESTED AT INDIANA FUEL SHOP

VALPARAISO, Ind. – A man with a guitar and a megaphone climbed atop a convenience store roof to serenade commuters with his musical protest of high gasoline prices – until police halted the impromptu concert.

Once atop the roof of the Family Express store Monday, and above pumps dispensing fuel at $3.78 per gallon, Jay Weinberg, 29, performed his ditty called "Price Gouge'n."

Dozens of supporters chanted: "I can't afford it. I'm banging on my dashboard. I can't believe they think I'm a fool."

The performance lasted about 15 minutes before three police officers arrived and arrested Weinberg on charges of trespassing and disorderly conduct. Police said he was cooperative.

The crowd, comprised of Weinberg's friends and other people who just happened to be pumping gas, continued singing. Then some, including his wife, Danielle, drove to Porter County Jail to bail him out.

Weinberg left the building around 7:30 p.m. and was greeted with cheers.

AUSTRIAN RUGBY TEAM PERFORMS STRIP SHOW AFTER SHUTOUT LOSS CAUGHT ON VIDEO

VILNIUS, Lithuania – The Austrian national rugby team tried to get over its 48-0 defeat by Lithuania by staging a mass striptease in the capital Vilnius late on Saturday, only to find they had been caught on video and put on the Internet.

The video, put out by a blogger on social community Web site Virb, www.virb.com/justafa/blog/701053, showed a group of 20 men singing and stripping off their clothes on a street in central Vilnius, while people in a nearby bar clapped and cheered.

"Yes, these were the men we played against on Saturday ... I guess the defeat could have prompted them to do that," Lithuanian rugby federation President Aleksandras Makarenka told Reuters.

Sherow balances family, work

Mark Savoy
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Matt Binter | COLLEGIAN

James Sherow, Manhattan city commissioner and K-State history professor, sits at a City Commission discussion and remarks about a proposition to make Manhattan more bicycle friendly.

James Sherow, professor of history at K-State, is not just a Manhattan city commissioner, he is also one of the most well-respected Western historians in the state.

His dissertation, "Discord in the Valley of Content," won the Westerners International-Phi Alpha Theta Award for the best dissertation in Western history, according to the K-State Department of History Web site.

James Sherow was born on June 8, 1951. Raised in Maize, Kan., Sherow grew up in a small community. He was a helping hand for his family and neighbors, doing intensive labor on farms. During high school, Sherow said he played in jazz band, played basketball and ran track. After graduating from Maize High School with about 50 other students, Sherow tried to better himself at Wichita State University. Before finishing his degree, Sherow joined the U.S. Air Force.

"I took a four-year vacation," Sherow said jokingly.

In the Air Force, Sherow earned the rank of E-5 Staff Sergeant. Sherow left the military with an honorable discharge.

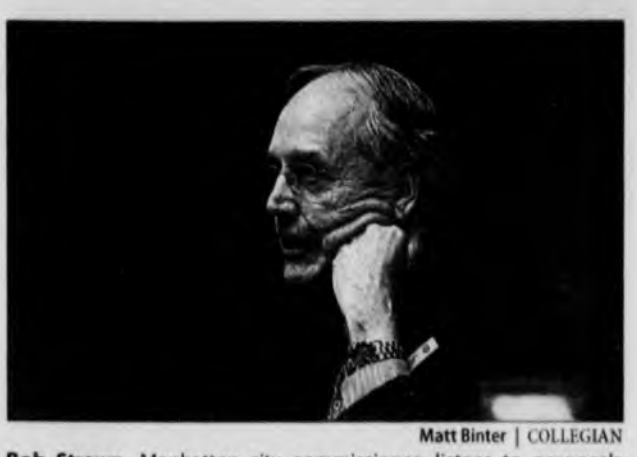
Sherow returned to Wichita State University and earned two majors in education and history, accompanied by two minors in psychology and political science. By 1978, Sherow completed his master's degree in history.

Sherow then moved to Kansas City, Kan., to teach at Turner High School and moved to the University of Colorado in Boulder, and earned his doctoral degree in history in 1982.

He moved to Texas and wrote his first book, "Watering The Valley: Development along the High Plains Arkansas River" in 1990.

Sherow came to K-State in fall 1992 and became a full-time professor in 2007. He has also written two other books, "The Grasslands of the United States: An Environmental History" and "A Sense of the American West: An Anthology of Environmental History".

Sherow said his books, commissioner title or accomplishments in his Western history studies are not his greatest achievements.



"I am the proud father of four daughters who are exceptionally accomplished," he said.

Sherow was elected to the Manhattan City Commission in 2007 and finds several issues to be important in the area, none more critical than the other. He said he does have a personal goal to serve and protect the community, though.

"The most important [goal] to me is looking after the safety and public welfare of the entire community," Sherow said.

Strawn sees KSU as center of city

Mark Savoy
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Matt Binter | COLLEGIAN

Bob Strawn, Manhattan city commissioner, listens to proposals to make Manhattan a more bicycle friendly community at a City Commission meeting Tuesday.

"Some around town called me a 'progressive conservative,' to which others say, 'yes, he's an oxymoron favoring strongly the [third and fourth] syllables," said Manhattan Commissioner Bob Strawn as a joke.

Though he pokes fun at his reputation, Strawn is all business when it comes to helping the people of Manhattan.

"My role as a commissioner, and the reason I was elected, was to protect taxpayer's interest. That's not government money, it's people's money," Strawn said. "I know we don't [spend money with tax payers' will] all the time, so my focus is to make sure that when we spend tax payers' money, that we spend it wisely, and that it accomplishes something for those people that is meaningful."

Strawn said he thinks K-State is the centerpiece of the Manhattan community.

"I have a strong view that K-State is an economic advantage to Manhattan," Stawn said. "The university will always be here. Fort Riley will come and go on political whims, [businesses] will come and go, but the university will stay. K-State is a fly wheel spinning off opportunities for this town."

Strawn was born in Sioux City, Iowa, and is the oldest of a family of seven. Strawn has two children and has two grandchildren.

During his youth, he worked with his father laying bricks to earn money. Strawn went to South Dakota State University and graduated in 1967 with a degree in economics. Strawn married his wife, Julia, that same year. Of all his accomplishments, Strawn said he views his marriage as his best.

"We've had 41 years together, and we've raised what I think is a great family," Strawn said. "In the end, that's all that matters in my view."

Strawn also served in Vietnam after an unfortunate failed physical examination at West Point Academy.

"I had wanted to go to West Point but didn't get in because of a physical," Strawn said. "I got my degree in 1967, got a job and got married and drafted. I went to the doctor and talked to him about my West Point physical. He pulled out a stethoscope, put it over my heart and said, 'Hell, there's nothing wrong with you,'" Strawn said, laughing.

Strawn worked for Chevron for 25 years before leaving to work at the world's leading airport and aircraft de-icer company, Cryotech, in 1991, according to his Web site. Strawn moved to Manhattan in 2004 and was elected to the Manhattan City Commission in 2007. He is serving a four-year term.

Swinging Doors

Nate Schmidt | COLLEGIAN

Students should be able to open doors hassle-free

JESSICA HENSLEY

Do you know what my favorite building on campus is? Cardwell Hall. Why? Because almost every day I get to watch some unassuming student walk smack into a closed door because a: the hinges were on the other side of the door, and/or b: the door swung in the other direction. Honestly, watching people try to figure out how the doors operate is the only thing that makes going to math class bearable.

This is why I was slightly offended by the suggestion that all doors on campus be standardized. Not only would it take away the highlight of my Cardwell Hall experience, I feel it would also dumb down the college experience as a whole. After all, if you can't figure out how to open the door, do you really need to be going to whatever class you're supposed to be attending in the building? I think not – you should probably head back to bed because today is just not your day.

According to an NBC News report on Alzheimer's in May of last year, doctors have found that mind games and problem solving can help ward off loss of memory and loss of brain function. Given the amount of strain that college students place on their short-term memory alone, we should promote healthy brain function by presenting students with small puzzles in everyday life – the puzzle of entering or exiting a building without looking like an idiot, for example.

All silliness and potential entertainment value aside, there are real reasons why the doors to buildings around campus should not be standardized. For one, replacing even a few doors in every building would be extremely costly. Surely there are more pressing improvements on which the university should be spending our tuition money – like those really cool green banners that now hang all over campus, ruining the view for all. Or that sweet new parking garage where you probably won't be allowed to park. Replacing the doors on campus because some people are too distracted or too lazy to figure out which side has hinges would be another notch in a long list of questionable expenditures.

Is it asking too much of K-State students to have doors that swing in different directions? I doubt it. Our university does, after all, rank first nationally among state universities in total number of Rhodes, Marshall, Truman, Goldwater and Udall scholars, and has since 1986. K-State students aren't stupid – surely we can continue to live and to learn without standardization of doors on campus. Besides, if people are no longer going to be walking into doors, why would anyone continue to go to math class?

Constant door struggle causes embarrassment, potential danger

MARK WAMPLER

"Oh, yeah, there she is, she's looking at me," I thought. I stared her down and flipped my hair in the manner the ladies love.

"Hey, you ... yeah. Hey, I see you ..." I said with my smile. She came closer, going out the same way I was.

"Here, let me get that door for you," I said to her. I pushed and nothing happened.

"Oh, this door must be jammed," I said. I began to push harder until my face was red and I was breathing heavy.

"Um, thank you; I think it opens on this side," she said, pushing the other end of the door and walking out herself.

I run into doors every day. My regular thought process goes something like this:

"Do the doors in Hale open from the right, or is that Eisenhower's? No, that's the Cardwell exit on the bottom floor. The top floor's doors are like Eisenhower's."

"Think fast, think fast, the door approaches."

By this time, I have rammed myself into the door with all of my weight on both sides of the handle, inevitably stumbling outside because of the unexpected shift in balance when the correct side opens.

All doors must be regulated to open the same way here at the university, and here are three reasons why.

The first reason, as I have illustrated above, is to save countless souls from embarrassment. Let me make it perfectly clear.

"Wham!" I immediately enter into a low crouch, centering my leg power, giving myself leverage to open the slightly jammed door. "Oh, yep, this building has doors that open on the left, I could have sworn this one had right doors," I think as I casually disengage from the crouch, glancing around and slightly arching my eyebrows in a sly smile, remaining poised and confident.

I then enter into a dead sprint, late for class now after the 15-minute struggle that I had with the door.

It must stop. I can no longer tell people that the door is jammed. They are beginning to become suspicious.

The second reason is a very serious one. In the event of an emergency, people are in greater danger as they will not be able to open the doors to exit the building.

"In the event of an emergency, students need to be absolutely certain which side the door needs to be pushed, otherwise countless lives will be put at risk," said Molly Sanders, freshman in English literature and expert on disaster control.

The third reason is that the writers of the U.S. Constitution thought it wise to regulate door hinges. People often get the right of free speech confused with the right of unregulated door hinges, but this is simply not the case. If the Founding Fathers considered this such an important issue, who are we to argue?

TO THE POINT

Students need to take some free time during finals week

There are few places more stressful than a college campus during finals week. Most students have an abundance of tests, papers, projects and last-minute loose ends to tie up that will keep them plenty busy next week, as the spring 2008 semester comes to a close.

TO THE POINT is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

While it's easy to give in to the stress of late-night cramming and scream profanities in the middle of a 10-hour study session in Hale Library, we encourage students to instead enjoy their last week of school.

There are plenty of study-break opportunities around campus, from free massages and ice cream in the K-State Student Union to outdoor activities like disc golf. Taking time from your busy study schedule to relax with friends and get some exercise could even give you an edge on your finals by refreshing your cluttered and stressed head.

Graduating seniors, especially, should make it a point to enjoy their last week of undergraduate collegiate life. The Alumni Center will have a Senior Send-off today, free of charge; if you're a graduating senior, gather up all your other senior friends and pay the Send-off a visit. After all, in a few months, you and your friends will be leading different lives in different parts of the state, country or even the world. Have a night in Aggieville to just hang out, and try not to talk too much about school or tests. Instead, focus on the friendships you have built over the last four years at K-State.

Dear Beta, I hope you like your rock's makeover. Love, Sigma Pi.

They just played the unedited version of "Sexy Can I" in the Derb, and I loved it.

I work at a gas station, and a teenage mother just came in and tried to buy cigarettes and blunt wraps with a food stamp card. Honestly, people. What is this world coming to?

I'm drunk on a Tuesday, but I think that's OK because it's almost finals week.

I'm hot cause I'm fly. You ain't cause you not. This is why, this is why, this is why I'm hot.

And now the Derb is playing "Sexual Eruption." Even better.

There's a sex toy somewhere on campus. Five dollars to the first person who finds it.

Seriously, what do I have to do to get in the Fourum? I've tried everything.

Is there some reason the Collegian breaks most of its articles, including the Fourum online section, into two pages when they could clearly fit on one page? Why must we always click on next?

Hey, Haymaker staff: You think you got all our porn. You're wrong.

Why is it so hot in this classroom?

Beer pong is the only game that the loser actually wins.

Is it bad that I'm getting high with my T.A. before my test?

I had two beers, and I had the hiccups. I hope it's a coincidence.

Model reflects on experience

By Elise Podhajsky
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Matt Binter | COLLEGIAN

Kyle Wilson, junior in painting, gauges his model for a painting in his Figure Drawing 1 class. Wilson said, "I think that drawing is an important fundamental of painting."

People have nightmares about it all the time – going to school or class in front of all their peers and realizing they are completely nude. Though the majority of students wake up in a cold sweat, relieved it was all just a dream, there are a few K-State students who don't. In fact, being naked at school is their job, and for students like Zoey, it has become more enjoyable than frightening. Zoey requested that her full name not be used.

Zoey, a student at K-State, is a model for K-State's Figure Drawing I class. She said she has taken many art courses and often would hear people in her classes talk about how Figure Drawing needed models.

Originally, she said she wanted to take Figure Drawing this semester and tried to enroll in Jason Scuilla's class, but all the spots were full. So she said she decided the best way to learn about figure drawing was to become a model for the class.

"At first I was really excited," Zoey said, "but then I realized I was going to be naked, and I was really nervous. It was kind of like that bad dream for the first few moments, and then I realized [the students] weren't seeing me as, 'Oh, my God, she's naked,' but more as, 'Oh, I have to draw this person.' They're actually seeing me as an object – which sounds weird – and not a naked girl. So once you realize that, then it's not awkward."

Zoey said she has become much more comfortable about being nude in her classes than she was at the beginning of the semester, and consequently she has become much more comfortable with her body. She said since taking the job, she has noticed an increase in her self-esteem.

"After a while, you get used to your body, and you're not seeing it like 'Ew, look at my legs,' or 'Ew, my stomach is so big,'" she said. "You just start to see it as you and appreciate it more and get comfortable in your own skin."

Scuilla, art professor and Figure Drawing I instructor, said the department usually sees models come and go throughout the semester, but rarely do they have models who are as talented and reliable as Zoey.

"Zoey has been one of the best female models that we've ever had since I've been here," he said. "She also has a background in dance and fashion, which makes her a really strong poser."

Zoey said she has been in dance and gymnastics for 12 years, so she knows how her body moves and is able to create her own poses and portray the emotions students are trying to achieve through their drawings.

Scuilla said models will do a series of short poses lasting from two to three minutes, or longer poses, which can last up to 15 to 20 minutes.

"A lot of times, we have to tell models what to do, but she is able to come up with many unique poses," he said.

Zoey said she is paid $10 an hour, modeling about 12 hours a week Monday through Thursday for the Figure Drawing I classes in Bluemont Hall, and has learned much from the class.

"It's actually a really good experience," she said. "You learn a lot, like how to draw proportions and muscles of the human body, so if someone's intrigued by the idea [of modeling], then I think they should definitely do it."

Scuilla said professors often struggle to find last-second models, but he has never had to worry about that with Zoey.

"She is someone who always approaches everything with a good spirit and always seems really happy to be there," he said. "Models with that kind of personality are really hard to find, so we really appreciate her in the drawing department."

Students discuss green roof possibility

By Veronika Novoselova
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State students and faculty will discuss proposals regarding green roofs for Seaton Hall and the new International Student Center rain garden at 7 p.m. Thursday at Manhattan Pubic Library.

Two multi-disciplinary student groups of about four people were given a task to create a project to convert three Seaton Hall roofs to green roofs, which are covered with vegetation and soil and planted over a waterproofing material.

"Students will present their findings and proposals on how to reduce heat load while retaining the runoff of rainwater," said Lee Skabelund, assistant professor of landscape architecture. "They will also discuss what kinds of plants and soils should to be used on a green roof."

Skabelund, who chairs K-State's green building committee, will talk about his experience of creating the rain garden in the ISC.

During the semester, each team member did several reviews of scholarly studies on the subject and found some innovative green roof ideas.

Christopher Potenski, senior in biological and agricultural engineering, said the group was unable to give exact recommendations because of time restrictions; however, the members tried to determine the cost of each component that could be included in a green roof.

"I think that participating in the project was a worthwhile and educational experience, though I felt that I did not accomplish as much as I had hoped for at the beginning of the project," Potenski said. "This proved that a lot more cooperation between engineers, architects, agronomists and everyone else is needed to streamline the green roof process."

Moses Manu, senior in social science, originally is from Tonga and played rugby as a child in New Zealand and Australia. After he moved to the United States from Australia when he was 16, he played one year of football at his high school. He later played football at El Camino College in Torrance, Calif., and then joined the K-State team two years ago.

Manu plays large role on rugby team

By Joel Aschbrenner
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Moses Manu finished his senior football season playing defensive end for the Wildcats, with 34 tackles, 5.5 tackles for loss and two sacks. He was not finished making big plays as a Wildcat though.

In early March, Manu joined the K-State/Fort Riley Rugby Club. The addition was immediate. In the first game of the season, before he joined the team, the Wildcats beat Benedictine College 3-0. The following week, with Manu staring at flanker, the Wildcats pounded Oklahoma State, 61-0, and Oklahoma, 51-12.

The Wildcats closed the season May 3, shutting out the Topeka Rugby Club 52-0, to finish with a 10-3 record. The club's vice president, sophomore center Tyler Hodges, said Manu was a game changer for the Wildcats all season.

"He's able to break a big run at anytime, and that's something that's pretty hard to come by," Hodges said.

Manu's athleticism made him force on defense, as well.

"He's definitely aggressive," said sophomore hooker Dan Knapp. "When you're in a game and Moses makes a big hit, it just fires you up. He makes you want to play better."

Manu said rugby was always his first love. He grew up in New Zealand and played from age five to 13. He then moved to Australia, where he played until he was 17. Both nations have rich rugby traditions – traditions that played a major role in his life.

"My Christmas present when I was four was a rugby ball," Manu said. "Its just part of the culture."

He played organized rugby until he moved from Australia to California, his senior year of high school, where he started playing football.

Even after playing football in high school, junior college and at K-State, he said he still prefers rugby. However, there are several ways football has helped him on the rugby field, he said. Football made him a more aggressive and physical rugby player, which, on a few occasions, has got him in trouble for illegal tackles.

"I always forget that I don't have pads and a helmet," he said.

While Manu dwarfs many of the other players on the team at 6-foot-2 and 250 pounds and possesses the dynamic athleticism to change a game in an instant, teammates said he is one of the team's most unselfish players. His teammates also said there were several opportunities for easy scores that

Scholarship loss might not hamper Wildcats that much

MIKE DEVADER

The K-State men's basketball team couldn't escape the memories of former head coaches Jim Wooldridge and Bob Huggins years after they left.

Coach Frank Martin's men's basketball program will lose a scholarship for the 2008-09 season because it fell short of the NCAA's mandated academic levels set forth by the Academic Progress Rate.

The APR measures the eligibility, retention and graduation of student-athletes competing on every Division I sports team and also serves as a predictor of graduation success.

With this definition, it's not hard to see we were gambling when we hired Huggins. When he was at Cincinnati, he had horrible retention and graduation rates. But let's face it, his teams back then were awesome, so many of the guys were going to the pros early; it's what happens when you're an upper-echelon program.

Huggins commented on his players' graduation rate during a 2008 NCAA Tournament press conference and said he talks to former players that have gone back to school and graduated. He was upset these rules don't take into account the fact that people leave early for the NBA.

He needs to stop lying to himself: He doesn't care about graduation rates; he wants to win basketball games. The same thing was true when he was here.

We should feel bad for Martin since he has to deal with the aftermath of the Huggins and Wooldridge mess. The program had to have seen this coming as a possibility because of the lack of recruits that were committed to K-State before the recent signings of guard Buchi Awaji and center Abdul Herrera.

All is not lost, however, as there are things to look forward to for next year's basketball team.

The biggest ray of hope would be the status of Bill Walker. Bill ... yeah ... be smart, you need to come back.

Will Jacob Pullen have the opportunity to throw ally-oops to David Hoskins?

When next year comes calling, the fans finally will get to see if the advertised speed of Denis Clemente is for real or not.

Ron Anderson's play in the NCAA Tournament was much improved, and he'll get a chance to prove he is a force with which to be reckoned

Men's basketball team to lose 1 scholarship

The latest NCAA Academic Progress Rate showed proficient ratings for most of the K-State intercollegiate athletics department, but the men's basketball team fell just short of the requirements.

The APR, which measures eligibility, retention and graduation of student-athletes, sets scores of 925 (for a four-year period) and 900 (for a one-year period), which amounts to about a 60 percent graduation rate. Both scores are out of 1,000.

The men's basketball team scored an 885 and will forfeit one scholarship for the 2008-09 school year. They will only be able to award 12 scholarships over the next year. This is the first warning to the basketball team in its history. According to a press release from the athletic department, an institutional plan is in progress to make sure the athletic department meets this requirement in the future.

KU also received penalties against its football program. During the 2008-09 school year, the Jayhawks will lose two football scholarships. Colorado received a warning for their men's basketball program and OSU will lose one women's basketball scholarship for the upcoming year.

Starting next year, teams that have penalties for three consecutive years might have their postseason restricted, in addition to additional scholarship and practice restrictions, according to a press release from the NCAA. Four consecutive years of APRs below 900 will limit the entire athletic department to be restricted.

How other Wildcat teams measured up:
Football: 935 rating (sixth in Big 12)
Men's golf: 993 rating (in the 80th percentile in the country)
Women's tennis: 993 rating (in the 90th percentile in the country)
Volleyball: 986 rating (between the 70th and 80th percentile in the country)
Women's basketball: 963 rating

Overall, there were 218 programs in the country who face penalties, with more than one-third of the 329 Division 1-A schools facing penalties in more than one sport, according to an article on USAToday.com. Out of the 218 programs, 53 of them were in men's basketball. Two of the hardest hit schools in football were San Jose State and University of Alabama at Birmingham, who each lost nine scholarships. Washington State and Idaho will lose eight football scholarships. Several schools only ended up losing partial scholarships in certain sports, based on the severity of the infraction.

Among other hard hit universitues, California State at Sacramento received penalties in seven sports and lost more than three scholarships (one scholarship in women's tennis and men's basketball, .36 of a scholarship in men's indoor track and .84 of a scholarship in baseball).

The K-State men's golf team's historic season was extended Monday when the Wildcats received an at-large bid to participate in the NCAA men's golf championships. The selection marks the first postseason appearance for K-State since the 2005-06 campaign.

Coach Tim Norris said the team deserved the bid.

"I thought [a bid] was definitely within our capabilities this season," said Norris, who has now led K-State to the post-season in five of the last six years. "We played solid throughout the year. We had a couple decent tournaments at the beginning of the year, and the guys did a good job of staying up in the rankings."

Norris said the Wildcats, who will compete as the 23rd-seeded team in the NCAA West Regional, will need to be on top of their game to succeed in the tournament.

"The seeding we received is what we deserved," he said. "We'll have to play well to advance. We'll probably have to overachieve to advance, but I think we're capable."

The tournament comes off the heels of one of the most successful seasons in school history. Backed by consistent success from sophomores Joe Ida and Mitchell Gregson, K-State captured eight top-five finishes, which ties the school record; a record-breaking team scoring average; and the school's first tournament victory in more than four years.

The Wildcats enter the postseason having placed in the top-five in six of their last eight events, highlighted by a first-place finish in the Ron Moore Invitational on March 25. While K-State might appear to have momentum, Norris said he views the team's next action as a fresh start.

"Everyone is in the same position right now," he said. "No one gets a bye in this one. Everyone starts at zero."

The tournament, which will take place at the Gold Mountain Golf Club in Bremerton, Wash., will begin May 15 and conclude May 17.

League promotes fitness, physical activity in summer

By Sarah Burford
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Manhattan Ultimate Summer League is recruiting members to play Ultimate Frisbee this summer starting June 5.

Shawn Kokenge, Manhattan resident and coach for K-State's Ultimate Frisbee club team, said he started the summer league in 1998. He said during the school year there were always people to play with, but in the summer, he got tired of playing four-on-four with the same seven guys. He started the summer league as a way to get new people involved in the sport.

"It came down to convincing other players that we did have enough players in Manhattan to set [the summer league] up," Kokenge said.

He said the league started with about 40 participants and now has about 150. The league hopes to have about eight co-ed teams this summer, with players of all ages.

Jimmie Blevins, graduate student in English and summer league captain, said participants rank their experience in Ultimate Frisbee when they register. The captains then draft team members to create a balance of new and experienced players on each team.

"We try to cater to the high school community as well, and K-State faculty," Blevins said. "We try to bring a disparate community together."

Rich Markle is the manager and co-owner of Rock-A-Belly Deli, which is one of the league's sponsors, along with Bluestem Bistro. He said he met his wife playing a pick-up Ultimate game, and they have been playing on the same summer league team for 10 years now. He said he has enjoyed the game so much that he wanted to facilitate it in Manhattan by supporting the summer league.

"It's a game that I love," Markle said. "It's been a lot of good times over the years."

Tom Grund, senior in civil engineering, president of K-State's Ultimate club team and summer league captain, said the summer league's purpose is to expand the game's popularity to Manahttan.

"We're looking to grow it," Grund said. "That's what I'm excited about. To grow people's knowledge overall."

Grund said the experienced players enjoy the opportunity to teach participants who don't know how to play Ultimate.

"It makes it easy for new people to start playing it," Markle said. "It's less competitive than the club play the rest of the year."

Kokenge said his favorite part about the summer league was getting to know new people and creating a bond with teammates.

"There's the social aspect of the league too," Kokenge said. "It's not just playing the sport."

The league fee is $10 per person, which pays for a team shirt. Members play on Thursdays throughout June and July. Participants can register at the summer league Web site, www.ksu.edu/Ultimate/musl08.

Student earns one of highest awards for graduate school

By Veronika Novoselova
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Michael Reppert, senior in chemistry, received the Presidential Award for Distinguished Undergraduate Student in Research, one of the highest rewards for a K-State undergraduate.

"It is a big honor for me to be given this award," Reppert said. "I didn't really expect that I would get it,"

The prize was created to reward outstanding K-State students for their research accomplishments.

During his internship in summer 2005, Reppert met Ryszard Jankowiak, professor of chemistry, who he has worked with since. Reppert said he greatly appreciated Jankowiak as a mentor.

"We have a guy in Colorado who isolates proteins from spinach, and he sends us these proteins, and then we freeze them and shoot them with lasers and see what happens," Reppert said, explaining the basics of his experiments. "We are trying to understand photosynthesis and the reactions themselves at a fundamental level."

These experiments could lead to creating ultra-efficient solar cells and help people during a severe energy crisis, he said.

"It is really intriguing," he said. "I like to know how things work."

Family plays an important role in Reppert's life because it provides support, he said. Reppert was homeschooled and encouraged to learn a variety of studies by his parents, Jay and Sue Reppert.

"It was a good preparation for the university," Reppert said.

Besides chemistry, Reppert has two other majors – biochemistry and mathematics. Chemistry was always interesting to Reppert, but he couldn't stand math until early high school, he said.

"If I wouldn't be homeschooled, I would continue to hate math," he said. "One semester I decided that I'm going to enjoy some part of it. I spend a lot of time just playing around with geometry, tried to prove things and it got me interested."

Virginia Naibo, assistant professor of mathematics, with whom Reppert took a high-level math class, said Reppert did an outstanding job.

"He likes to be challenged and has a lot of good qualities," she said.

Reppert has not chosen where to go to graduate school, but he said he enjoys being a Wildcat.

"My favorite thing about K-State is that there are a lot of professors and researchers who are very helpful," he said. "It is a good place for me."

Studying and doing research takes up a considerable portion of his schedule, so Reppert spends hours in the lab or at his computer.

He said his tip to successful studying is paying attention to the class at the beginning.

"A lot of people think they can make up later on, but if you don't know the basics, it is really hard to figure out the rest of the subject," he said.

Outside of academia, one of Reppert's interests is music. He usually plays bluegrass once a week in his friend's house and periodically visits bluegrass jams around the area.

He also said he enjoys traveling. Some of the professors he worked with were Polish, so this summer Reppert is going to Poland to visit friends and study the language.

Ryan Bradburn, research aide in diagnostic medicine pathobiolgy, met Reppert through the KSU Juggling Club a couple of years ago and now they share several hobbies.

"He still comes out and juggles with us," Bradburn said. "We've also done some canoeing/kayaking together and are looking into putting a camping/canoe trip on the Kansas River sometime this summer."

Friends described Reppert as a smart, adventurous and kind person.

"He is very accomplished academically, but he doesn't let that go to his head," said friend Joshua Schumm, senior in management. "He is someone who appreciates the small things in life, and he is an encouraging person to spend time around. Mike's most notable personality trait is his hard-working nature. He does everything as well as he can."

"Serving K-State Students since 1890"

Adviser pushes students, helps them win prestigious scholarships

By Kristin Hodges
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A stack of shelves list the names of scholarships that students across the country dream of getting. Applicants sometimes prepare semesters in advance for these nationally competitive awards.

According to a K-State media release, K-State students have won more than 124 of these national scholarships since 1986. One man works behind the scenes to encourage and assist students through the process.

Jim Hohenbary, assistant dean for Nationally Competitive Scholarships, helps students prepare and be as competitive as possible for prestigious scholarships like the Udall, Goldwater and Rhodes.

"What I like about this job is I get to work with bright students from all different disciplines, so it's very interesting to learn about the directions that many different students are taking," he said. "Every visit to my office will be different, and that's what I like about it."

PROGRAM SUCCESS

Hohenbary informs students about scholarship opportunities and helps them find ones they qualify for. For scholarships that require university nomination, he directs the nomination process. Once students decide to apply, he assists them throughout the application process.

"I work with them as a resource to help them put forward the best possible application by doing things like critiquing personal statements in a résumé, advising them on what letters of reference they should choose and helping them sort out what a particular scholarship organization might be looking for."

Hohenbary said the year he started was the year the National Association of Fellowship Advisers started.

"I think the fact that there now is a professional organization is a good illustration of how many more universities are starting to do what K-State has done for a long time," he said.

Hohenbary said he is the third person to serve in the scholarship advising position at K-State. He credits the program's success to Nancy Twist, former pre-law adviser and the first person to take on the responsibility of running the campus selection process.

"She took it seriously and really worked to help make students aware of these opportunities and helped them be successful," he said, "and so from there I think she just really created the momentum for somebody to work on these kinds of things full-time. It's really the model that she created that has been the blueprint for the office."

A K-STATE START

Hohenbary joined the K-State faculty in 1997 as an open-option adviser, though he was not new to the university.

He received a master's degree in creative writing from the university before he started working in the College of Arts and Science's dean's office.

Hohenbary discovered his interest in helping students as an undergraduate at Truman State University in Kirksville, Mo. There he was part of the student activities board, similar to K-State's Union Program Council, but what influenced him more was his position as a residence hall assistant.

"The way it was set up at Truman State, I was expected to provide some initial academic advising to students before they met with their official adviser," he said. "I had the experience in working with students in that sense of planning out classes and schedules, and that was part in what interested me in the open-option position – thinking that it had been enjoyable and doing that in a more serious way."

After a few years in the open-option position, Hohenbary applied for the scholarship adviser position.

SCHOLARSHIP SUCCESS

Hohenbary said preparing for the national scholarship application process takes time. He tries to have students nominated far in advance of deadlines so they have time to rework their application.

For scholarships that do not require institutional endorsement, he recommends that students give themselves at least a month, though he thinks it's better if they have more time than that.

"It depends what the scholarship is," he said. "The ideal scenario would be talking to people semesters in advance so they know when they're going to need to start things."

Hohenbary said through all of his work with students, he never forgets their experiences. Often when students are successful, they send him a postcard or note thanking him for their help. Postcards from Prague, Czech Republic, and the University of Oxford hang on his file cabinets, reminding him of students' accomplishments.

"After you have worked with them enough and you're invested in what they're trying to make happen, to see that pay off is great," he said.

Hohenbary said even though some students are not successful in receiving a scholarship, the process is still beneficial because it teaches them to put together items like a résumé to make themselves marketable.

HEAD COACH

In a K-State media release, President Jon Wefald said Hohenbary would be a multiple winner of the "academic coach of the year award," if it were a true honor.

Hohenbary said the comment is flattering, and he said his job is similar to coaching because students are entering a very competitive environment while he encourages them.

"I guess the extent to which it's not exactly like coaching is that I don't set an agenda for the students' activities. If, say, they're in an interview for a scholarship, I'm not there. We don't get to huddle halfway through the interview. I don't get to see them perform.

"But in the sense that the students are talking to me, and this is something other people are preparing as hard as they can, I have information that I can share and perspectives to give them on that."

Hohenbary said he wants students to know they can be successful at the national level.

"Students think they might not be able to win, but they should keep in mind that it is probably the same thing that a lot of these people that have won thought before somebody twisted their arm to apply," he said.

He said the people "twisting their arms" are either him or other faculty members, but it is what keeps the program going.

"One of the things that I'm really fortunate in is that I get to work with a very supportive faculty at K-State," he said. "They're generally very helpful in encouraging students to apply and being willing to serve on selection committees.

"So any success that K-State students have in the scholarship process is through their abilities and efforts, and I think it's a generally supportive environment. Helping students succeed in the scholarship arena is a university commitment and not just a commitment by our office."

DEFERRED MAINTENANCE | Willard will soon house much of KSU art department credits.

While Willard's roof and its structuring also need to be replaced, DeBusman said the roof project is still in the preplanning process. Facilities planning hired outside consulting firms that have replaced aging electrical, mechanical and plumbing systems. Outside firms also will replace the roof, windows and stone work.

"Many of the original plaster walls are cracked," according to a Board of Regents September 2007 release. "The floor tiles and ceilings contain asbestos and require abatement."

The art department will receive new exhausts and sinks for cleaning up after art projects and studios. DeBusman said K-State's Facility planning also will fix deferred site drainage projects.

"We have water that rushes down the Quad area and goes into in the lower level and is damaging the foundation walls," he said.

Throughout Willard, facilities plans to convert several former chemistry and biochemistry labs into art studios.

Prior to Hale Library's construction in the mid 1990s, the art department used facilities in a building near the current library. After the building was torn down for Hale's construction, sections of the department relocated to West Stadium, DeBusman said.

The art department could not move entirely into Willard because the hall housed the biochemistry and chemistry departments. Since then, the Department of Chemistry has been moving into King Hall and the biochemistry building next to King. Biochemistry already relocated to Chalmers Hall, DeBusman said.

"Both biochemistry and chemistry will be completely moved out of Willard Hall hopefully by the end of the summer," DeBusman said.

Meredith Karlin, junior in art education, has taken courses like 3-D Design, Oil Painting, Metalsmithing, Photography and Survey of Art History in Willard.

In her Oil Painting class, Karlin said the classroom had broken windows. Karlin also said Willard rarely has hot water.

"I think that it's very needed," Karlin said about the improvements. "I'm always very disappointed to see the art facilities at K-State because I've seen the art facilities at KU, and it looks like [K-State] doesn't care about the art department."

Several broken tiles and windows can be seen throughout Willard Hall, which will receive much-needed funding to repair damage in the building and bring it up to safety codes.

OVERRIDE | Move could help Sebelius

relying on a different interpretation of several laws in place. Jones-Sontag said Bremby is being sued in district court.

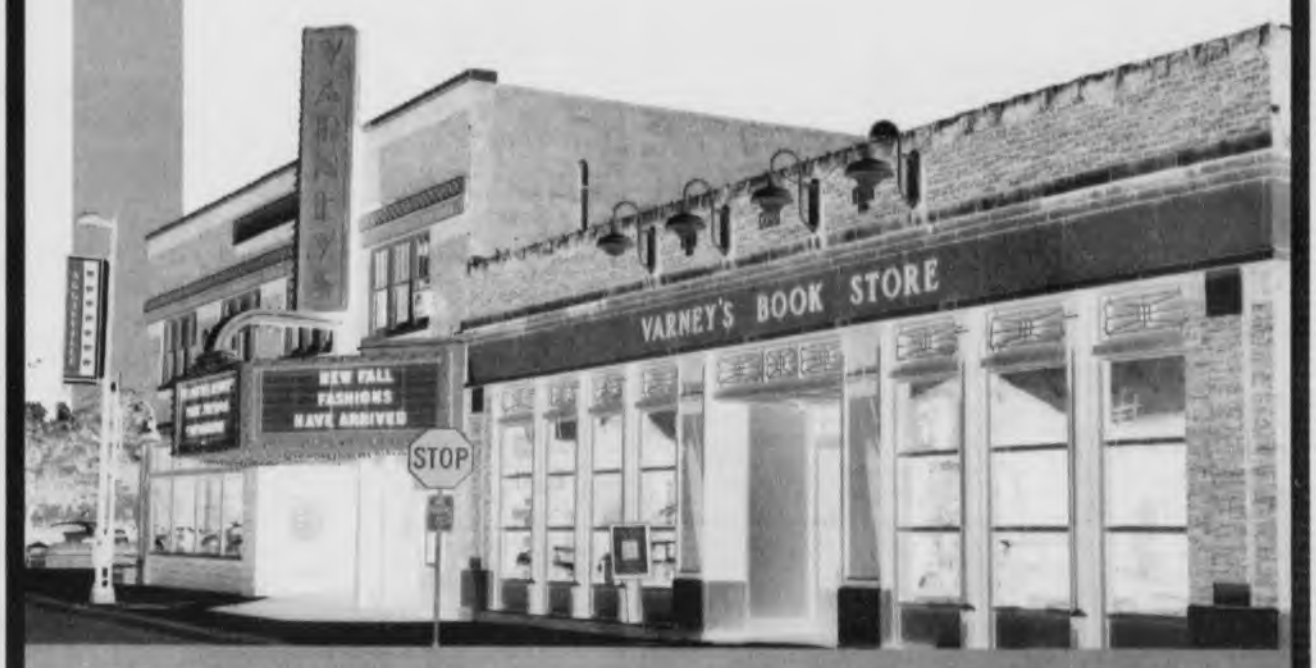
The Democrats and Republicans who supported the veto are contending that Kansas is heading in a new direction.

"We are at a critical period for energy policy in this state and this country. We must bridge the gap between our growing energy needs, and the time when carbon capturing technology is a commercial reality. We must move forward strategically – steering our state clear of the environmental, health and economic risks of massive new carbon emissions," Sebelius said in a response to the House action to sustain her veto of SB 148.

Supporters of the $3.6 billion expansion of the Sunflower plant in Holcomb have written SB 148 into a Senate Substitute for House Bill 2412. Carlin said she saw this as a move to exert pressure on members of the house that might feel obligated to pass 2412 legislation because part of the legislation will benefit their districts.

Jones-Sontag said that is not the intention of 2412. She said that it is common practice for legislatures to add on pieces of legislation as a session comes to an end.

Jones-Sontag questioned Sebelius' commitment to greenhouse emissions, saying if carbon emissions are a source of concern for Sebelius, she should not favor the $800 million BNSF IntermodalTransfer Facility [a massive train depot] that will be created in Johnson County if House Bill 2412 is passed. She argues it will be just as detrimental to the environment as the Sunflower plants.



Whispers have been floating as to whether Kathleen Sebelius could be a vice-presidential candidate during the democratic primary. After President Bush's State of the Union this year, Sebelius gave the democratic response, exposing her to a national audience. Sebelius also endorsed presidential hopeful Sen. Barack Obama before the Kansas Democratic caucuses on Feb. 5.

"This veto enhanced her national reputation, but that doesn't mean she did it for this reason. She has said she would except one coal plant, but two was improper given the projected energy needs in the state's future," said Joseph Aistrup, head of the political science department.

MANU | Former player recruits other teammates

Manu gave up, just to pass the ball.

"He's one of the better team player's we've got," Hodges said. "Even though he's probably the biggest, best athlete we've got, he's still into the team concept." Regularly one of the first players to arrive at practice and one of the last to leave, Manu brought a sense of dedication to the team as well.

"The first time I met him, he said rugby was his first love," Knapp said. "It's one thing to be out here and just playing, but if you love the sport, then you're really committed to it. And he was really committed to it."

Though he is graduating this semester, Manu could leave a lasting influence on the team, as he has recruited several current Wildcat football players to join the rugby team.

He said offensive linemen Alesana Alesana and Ben Liu, as well as linebackers Reggie Walker, and Hansen Sekona, who have all played rugby before, expressed interest in playing for the club – after their final football season with the Wildcats.

If Manu stays in Manhattan after he graduates, he said he will continue to play for the team in the club games, but will not be eligible to play in intercollegiate games. But no matter where he ends up after graduation, he plans on playing rugby.

He said he will play club rugby wherever he lives next year, and eventually wants to try out for the U.S. national team.

"If I do move somewhere else I'll still look for a club," Manu said. "I still love this game, so I just want to keep playing it; it's just part of my life."

DEVADER | Wooly should be honored

with. Maybe someone needs to talk trash on Anderson as he goes into the locker room at halftime so he can play angry like Michael Beasley.

Something tells me with another year in the gym, Dominique Sutton could be as intimidating physically as Hoskins; he would be unstoppable if he would shoot the ball more when he has a wide open jumper.

On the lighter side, we should also say thanks to Wooldridge by paying him tribute for what he left behind for the university.

The easiest way to do this, if we play host to a Big Monday game next season, would be to have a Wooldridge neck brace theme night – all students should where a replica Wooly neck brace.

Mike DeVader thinks — no, knows — he hates KU with a passion. Period. Please send comments to sports@spub.ksu.edu.

Monica Moree, aka Dusty Garner, performs as a DJ at Club Heat in PJs Bar earlier this semester. Club Heat is Manhattan's only gay night at a bar.

"The bigger the hair, the bigger the falsies, the bigger the hips, the tinier the waist, the better. And the bigger the jokes, the more you can make people laugh."

KSU student leads multifaceted life as drag queen, restaurant owner

By Alex Peak
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Dusty Garner is more than just a set of pretty legs and really big knockers.

"When I'm out and about, I'm actually a horribly shy person," said Garner, the accomplished drag queen, restaurant owner and full-time student.

The regular blond-haired, blue-eyed, jeans wearer said while he's too shy to even go up and talk to people when he goes out, Garner's personality changes 180 degrees when he turns into his counterpart Monica Moree.

"Put on a wig and a dress and about a pound of makeup, and I can do anything," he said. "I'm fearless all of a sudden."

Garner started dressing in drag when he was 15 in Wichita. He thought that's what all gay men did.

"In my head, I had this vision of there being this kind of master sign-up sheet [for dressing in drag] and everybody, you know, took turns putting their name on the list," he said.

However, by the time he realized not all gay men wear bras and skirts, he was hooked by the fun, entertainment and feeling of needing to perform that comes along with being a drag queen.

While Garner said he fits comfortably in women's clothing, his parents had a hard time understanding and accepting his new cross-dressing hobby. He said his mother was afraid he wanted to become a woman – which Garner said was not what he wanted at all. He sees dressing in drag as a chance to take on a different personality.

"For me, it was an opportunity to not just be a character, but to be a character that I created from scratch," he said. "I created [Monica Moree] background; I created her mannerisms, her personality, her zest, her zeal. Everything was of my creation."

High heels, hand-shaped foam "hip" pads, prosthetic cleavage, a denim and stainless steel corset and tight dresses aren't everything up Garner's sleeve.

Before landing at K-State, he lived in Amsterdam, where he did drag; Las Vegas, where he was host to "V the Ultimate Variety Show" at the Venetician; and he also resided in New York City and London as an assistant publicist for the theatrical version of "The Lion King." Most recently, he worked as a flight attendant for National Airlines out of Las Vegas and Comair out of Cincinnati.

Garner said he started coming to Manhattan about four and a half years ago as a national board representative of Delta Lambda Phi National Social Fraternity, a progressive fraternity, to help activate a local chapter.

"When I first came here, I was surprised at how conservative Manhattan was," he said. "It's fun to watch that pendulum swing back the other direction. It wasn't that long ago that Manhattan was a fairly liberal place to be. There used to be a gay bar in Aggieville, for God's sake. It wasn't so long ago; it can't be that unfathomable for people."

Garner started his college career as a political science student last summer. Along with being a full-time student and doing several drag shows each month, Garner also began bartending at PJ's Bar in Aggieville, and in the process, discovered an opportunity waiting to happen.

"I happened to be poking around in the back [of PJ's] one day, and I happened to notice that there's a full kitchen back there that hasn't been used in more than a year," he said. "I thought 'that's just money going out the window.'"

And along came Big Momma's Grill, a hamburger-and-fries joint within PJ's. As Garner himself admits, despite some medical obstacles, he's a mover and shaker, and he looks for opportunities everywhere around him.

As a two-time survivor of Non-Hodgkins Lymphoma, Garner just recently found out his cancer is back with what appears to be colon cancer.

TOP LEFT: Garner first visited Manhattan as a national board representative of his fraternity Delta Lambda Phi to open a local chapter. TOP RIGHT: Garner works at PJ's Bar on Monday night, pouring drinks and enjoying live music. ABOVE: Garner has to take a handful of pills twice a day as part of his cancer treatment. Dusty was recently diagnosed with his third bout of cancer. He said he does fret about it, though, the pills go down quick.

"I don't do anything small," he said sarcastically. "If you're gonna do it, do it big. I'm also HIV-positive.

"I was raised to believe everything that doesn't kill you only makes you stronger, and I look at things more as opportunities."

He said he does everything he can to help and look out for other people.

"Instead of wallowing in what's going on in my world, I'm very much a, 'Well, let's see what we can do to make this a better situation for other people' kinda guy," he said. "I very much try to use myself as an empowerment tool for other people. I want to inspire people to do things, to get off their asses and make a difference in the world around them."

"SPEED RACER" (PG)

Born to race cars, Speed Racer is aggressive, instinctive and, most of all, fearless. His only real competition is the memory of the brother he idolized — the legendary Rex Racer, whose death in a race has left behind a legacy that Speed is driven to fulfill. Speed is loyal to the family racing business, led by his father, Pops Racer, the designer of Speed's thundering Mach 5.

"WHAT HAPPENS IN VEGAS..." (PG-13)

Two people discover they have gotten married following a night of debauchery in Vegas, with one of them winning a jackpot after playing the other's quarter. The pair tries to undermine each other and get their hands on the money ... falling in love along the way.

"THE FALL" (R)

In Los Angeles, circa 1920s, a little immigrant girl finds herself in a hospital recovering from a fall. She strikes up a friendship with a bedridden man who captivates her with a whimsical story that removes her far from the hospital doldrums into the exotic landscapes of her imagination.

"SURFWISE" (R)

Like many American adventurers, Dorian "Doc" Paskowitz set out to realize a utopian dream. Abandoning a successful medical practice, he sought self-fulfillment by taking up the nomadic life of a surfer. But unlike other American searchers like Thoreau or Kerouac, Paskowitz took his wife and nine children along for the ride, all 11 of them living in a 24-foot camper. Together, they lived a life that would be unfathomable to most, but enviable to anyone who ever relinquished their dreams of a straight job.

Shop Quick worker robbed

By Salena Strate
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A gas station clerk was robbed at gunpoint early Thursday morning, according to a Riley County Police Department report.

At 12:45 a.m., a suspect entered the Shop Quick at 430 Fort Riley Blvd. RCPD Lt. Kurt Moldrup said the gas station clerk, who was sweeping the back of the store, moved to the front of the store to attend to the suspect. Then, a second suspect entered the business, pulled out an unknown handgun and demanded money. An undetermined amount of money was stolen from the Shop Quick. The suspects fled the store on foot and headed west.

The first suspect was described as a black man, 5-feet 10-inches tall, wearing a red sweatshirt with a hood. The second suspect with the unknown handgun was described as a black man, 5-feet 9-inches tall, wearing a red sweatshirt with a hood and a bandana covering his face.

Police recovered video, which will provide evidence, Moldrup said.

Nigerian delegation to visit

By Scott Girard
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A governor's delegation from Zamfara, a state in Nigeria, Africa, will visit K-State on Monday to examine the university's beef and cattle capabilities and possibly pursue a partnership to expand its knowledge and production of beef and cattle products.

But that is not the only welcome Zamfara governor Mahmoud Aliyu Shinkafi will receive. Myra Gordon, associate provost for diversity and dual career development, said K-State will sponsor a memorial service and walk from the Alumni Center to the Martin Luther King Jr. bust east of Ahearn Field House at 4 p.m. in honor of Shinkafi's deceased brother, who graduated from Fort Hays State University in the 1970s.

"I think its such a beautiful and personal thing to do this for the man," Gordon said. "He seemed to be really close to his brother."

Gordon said she met Shinkafi, along with Ike Ehie, associate dean and director of undergraduate programs in the College of Business Administration, when they were invited to the governor's residence in Zamfara. During the talk, Gordon said the governor talked about the country's growing beef and cattle industry and its need for guidance.

"Our response was, 'Do we have the people for you who can do this,'" Gordon said.

When she found out that Shinkafi was traveling to the U.S., Gordon said she immediately thought of bringing him to K-State.

"I used my contacts from when we went over there to get K-State on the itenerary," she said. "We were very lucky and fortunate for him to come here."

Shinkafi, along with his wife, chief of staff, principal private secretary, special adviser on livestock development, among others from the Zamfara, will meet with representatives from K-State's Beef Cattle Institute on Monday. Gordon said the institute speaks with industry leaders from many countries and states across the world, lending its expertise in beef and cattle education.

Home, sweet, home

Reporter tours decades-old President's house on KSU campus

By David L. Griffin
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Though students have almost unlimited access to most buildings on campus, one building is seldom toured by students.

The home of President Jon Wefald and his family is one of few campus buildings where permission is necessary to enter. Wefald and his wife Ruth Ann have lived on K-State's campus in the President's house for 21 years. The three-story house was built in 1923 and has five bedrooms, four and a half bathrooms, a dining room, living room, two studies, a library, a two-car garage and a large backyard.

The house sparkles, with white carpet matching the seemingly spotless white walls decorated with artwork and family and university pictures.

Ruth Ann Wefald said when she and her husband first moved to the house in 1986, changes were made almost immediately. The Kansas Board of Regents set up a fund so the house could be remodeled, recarpeted, repainted and fitted with new drapes.

"The house had been used a lot, and it needed it," she said. "It was time for refurbishing."

Though the Wefalds have lived in the house for a long period of time, Ruth Ann Wefald made it clear the house was not the family's own personal home.

She said family members have to be more cautious of what they do to the house, just like the families before them.

The President's house actually belongs to the university, and any construction to it is done through university funding. Most of the furniture, on the other hand, does belong to the Wefalds, with the exception of the dining room table.

The President's house actually belongs to the university, and any construction to it is done through university means. Almost all furniture and other house decorations belong to the Wefald's though.

Throughout the house, pieces of K-State's history line the walls. In September 1989, the garage at that time was turned into the present library, and a new garage was built. Ruth Ann Wefald said the look of those new features was so seamless that most people who asked about the new additions couldn't tell what was redone.

"They replicated the stone work so beautifully," she said.

Ruth Ann Wefald said the two bedrooms and the bathroom on the third floor were at one time the rooms of housemaids that stayed through many presidents' families.

"This really is a historic house that does require lots of work and so forth to keep it up, but we do our best," she said.

Some support Aggieville dress codes, others question owners' motives

By Brandi Brumback, Jonathan Garten and Brandon Steinert
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Many public places institute dress codes, but several Aggieville bars have taken it farther than no shirt, no shoes, no service.

Sideways hats, baggy pants, backpacks and sunglasses are just a few items prohibited by dress codes in some Aggieville bars.

A diverse crowd visits the local business district and some groups are affected more than others.

Though some might see certain dress-code rules as an inconvenience, others said they felt their universal application helps maintain safety and a positive image at the bars.

SAFETY AND IMAGE

Anna Quisenberry, senior in public relations, said she was going to meet friends at Tanks Tavern after studying at the library one night and wasn't planning on drinking at the bar, but wasn't allowed in simply because she was wearing a backpack.

Backpacks and handbags are prohibited at Tanks Tavern, according to their posted dress-code.

"I kind of appreciated it," Quisenberry said. "That could have been bad if they would have let someone in who wasn't just carrying books."

Quisenberry said she believes the bars have these rules in order to maintain a certain image as well as concern for safety.

"People should respect the place that they're going to and the rules that are there," Quisenberry said. "If not, then they should go someplace else."

However, some bar-goers do not have the same sentiments about the dress code.

Josh Criswell, senior in social sciences and former president of K-State's Black Student Union, said he has been told to tuck in his necklace at Aggieville bars in both polite and hostile ways. He said he felt some bars decided to change the rules suddenly without warning, and that some of them target certain groups. He said he does not understand the safety reasons the bars claim are behind their dress codes.

"Honestly I think we have bigger issues to face," Criswell said. "Let's not talk about me wearing sunglasses. Let's talk about why you have a problem with me wearing the glasses."

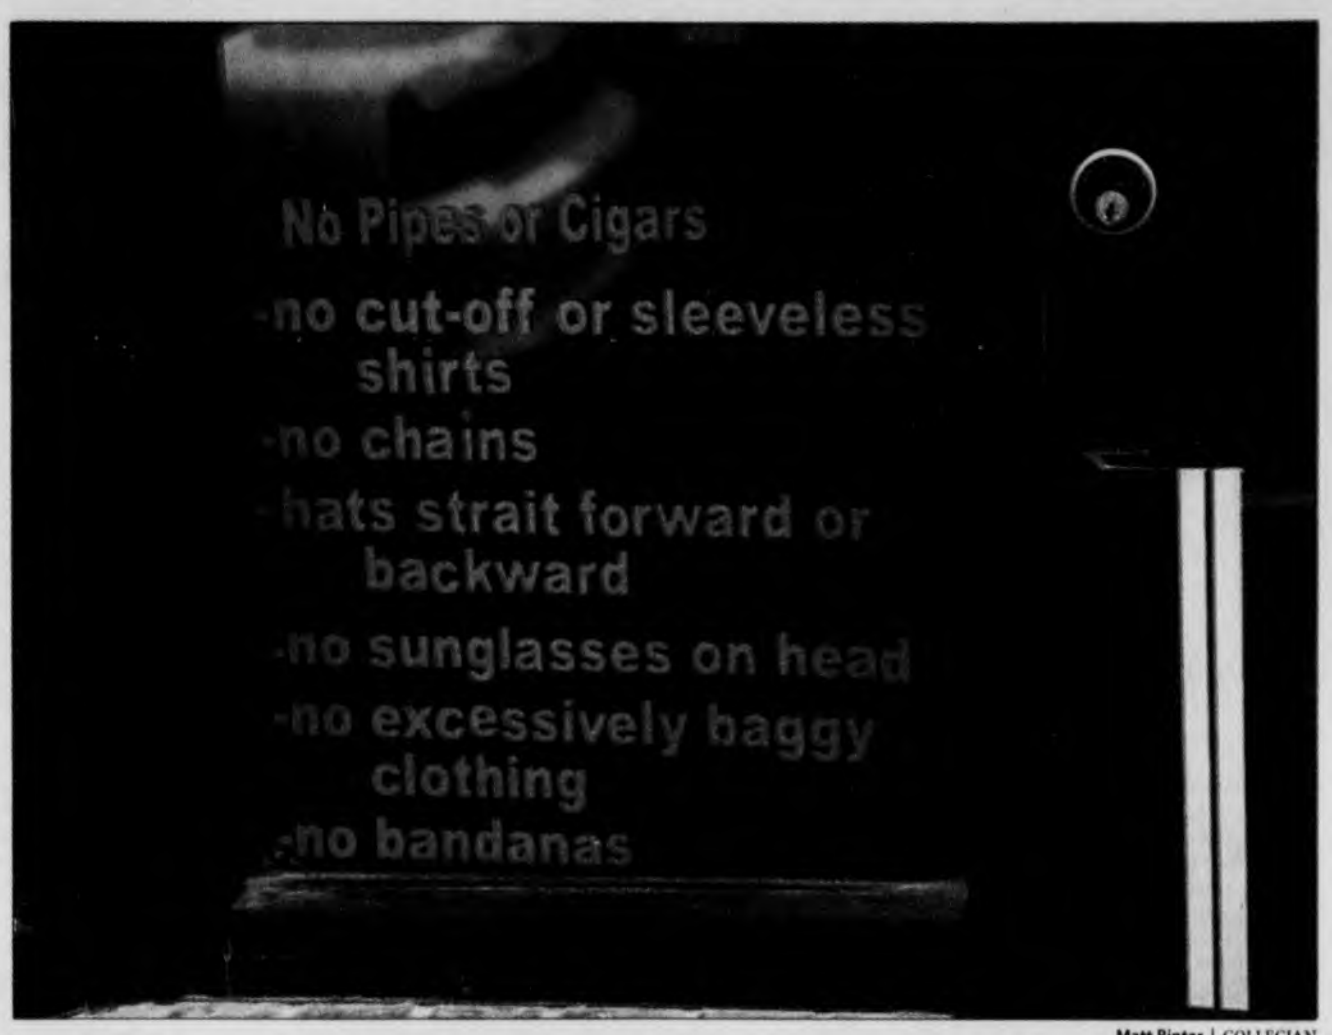
Criswell said he believes the dress codes target young African-American men.

Christi Nelson, bar manager at Kite's Bar and Grill said they enforce a dress code. She said the dress code prohibits apparel like bandanas, baggy pants, grills, visible boxers, sleeveless shirts, wallet chains and inappropriate headwear. Hats must be worn straight forward or backward.

She said the rules were established in the interest of safety.

"I think it's more the type of behavior from that type of crowd. We are trying to minimize fights and keep it safe in here," Nelson said.

PJ's Bar is one Aggieville establishment that does not have a dress code. Dusty Garner, manager and restaurant owner said he has heard of bar dress-codes in big cities but does not see the reason for it in Manhattan.



He said everyone who frequents PJ's has their own style, and he does not choose to infringe upon that.

"We've just always been so much about our wide clientele from the gay clientele to hip-hop night to Latin night," Garner said. "I think they would not respond well to being told they couldn't dress a certain way."

Though some bars cite safety reasons for the rules, others also say it is about setting a standard.

"We just took our ideas off of what the other bars did because we've got families coming in here to eat," said Pat Atchity, general manager of Tubby's Bar and Grill. "We're trying to be a classy bar, and we just want people to look nice."

Atchity said there are a few who might complain about the dress-code, but most people are respectful of it.

Matt Binter | COLLEGIAN
A sign on the door of Tubby's Bar and Grill explains dress codes that prohibit several clothing items. Other bars in Aggieville also have dress codes. Some people in the community view the codes as racially motivated, but several others view them as appropriate.

"It goes over well, people like it and it's just what we do," Atchity said. "When you get to own an establishment, you have the right to put what you do and don't want."

In an e-mail interview with the Collegian, Brett Allred, owner of Tanks Tavern said the dress code at his bar has nothing to do with fights.

"We are trying to maintain a certain level of atmosphere and require our customers to dress to a certain level to maintain this," Allred said. "Our dress code is where we set our standard."

FROM SAN JUAN TO NO SUNGLASSES

An offensive act 20 years ago in Aggieville prompted one former K-State student to start an annual event to promote inclusiveness in the Manhattan community.

In June 1988, a group of Puerto Rican K-State students rented the Bushwacker's Club in Aggieville and celebrated the day of San Juan - the patron saint of the island. Bar employees hung signs using obscene language that referenced San Juan.

"The bar tried to play it off as a joke and that a couple of employees just took it too far," said Barbara Baker, who was a cabinet member for the Student Governing Association president at the time of the incident. "However, students who were there said it was more than just a joke."

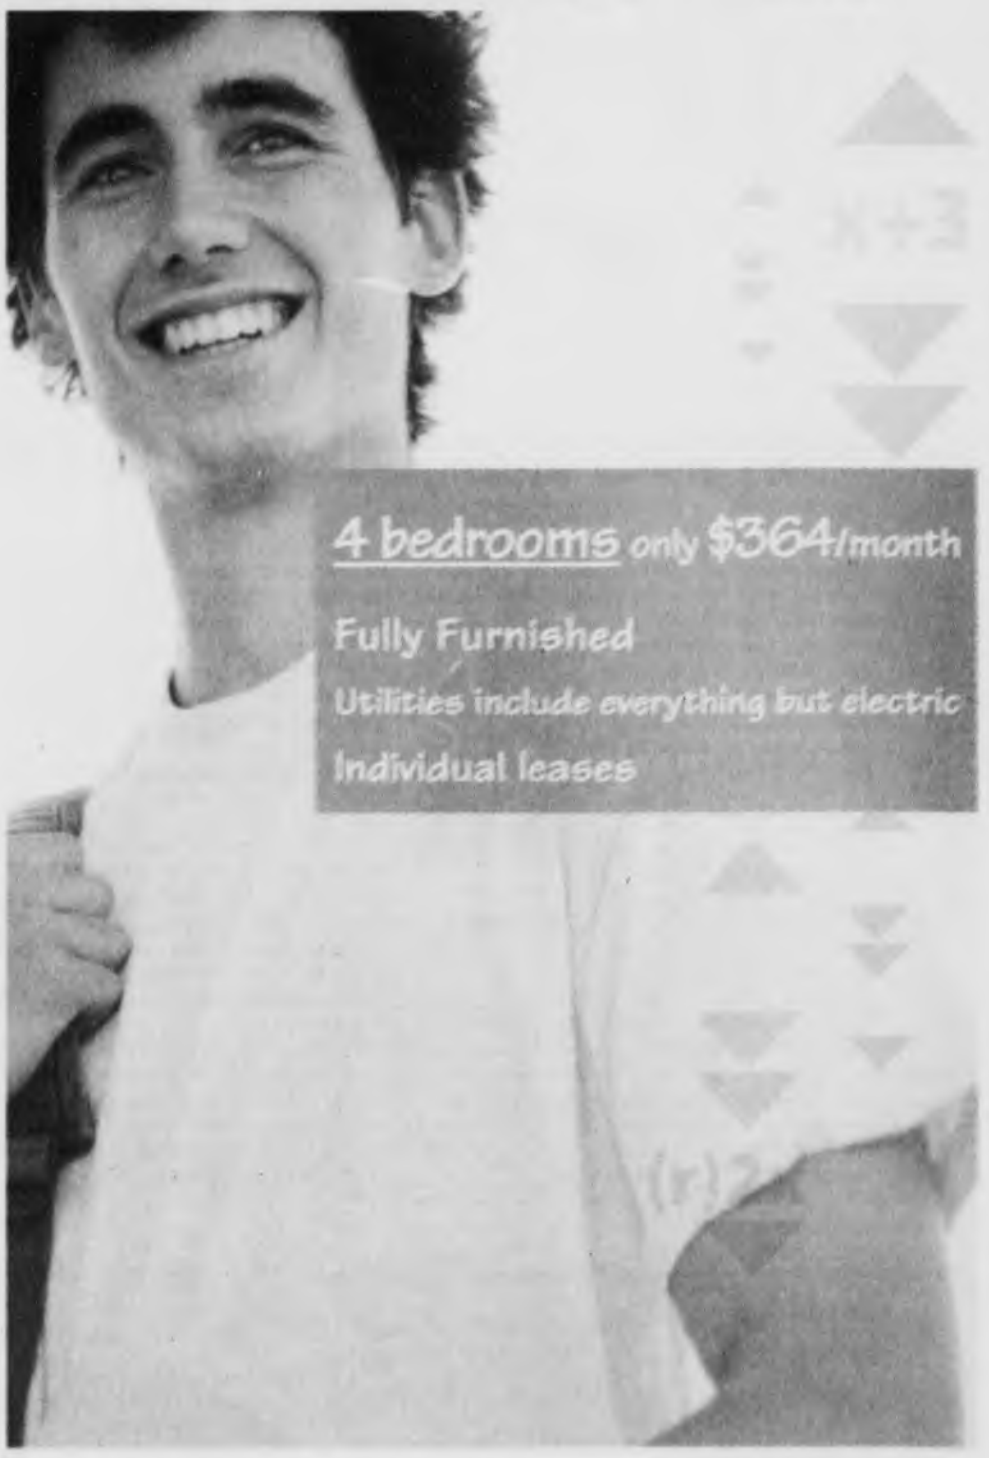
Baker said several students protested the bar in response to the San Juan incident. The state attorney general's office eventually ruled against Bushwacker's Club, which is no longer in Aggieville.

Baker, who is now the director of multicultural affairs at Emporia State University, used her position within SGA to found Racial/Ethnic Harmony Week in fall 1988 to promote inclusiveness in the Manhattan community. The name of the event was changed to Community Cultural Harmony Week in 2002.

Though Harmony Week has spent 20 years promoting inclusiveness, there are several Aggieville bars that use dress codes to exclude people wearing certain clothing.

Criswell said his evening clothing style has changed since many bars began enforcing dress-code policies. Criswell said do-rags, sunglasses and his fraternity necklace were the main pieces of attire that got him in trouble with bouncers and other bar employees.

"I like to wear my sunglasses at night if they match what I'm wearing," Criswell said. "Who are they hurting? It's not like I'm throwing gang signs."



Baker occasionally has problems with the way her students dress at Emporia State. She said she thinks it is disrespectful when students show up at important lectures and wear their hats backwards.

She said she believes the bars have their dress codes because of the negative media images that are associated

To eat or not to eat?

Eating meat is what makes America, America

MARQUIS CLARK

Meat vs. vegetables – it just doesn't seem fair, does it? When you think of your classic meat-eater, you get everything that's great about America: strength, honor, desire, purposeful stare, sharp canines, K-State. The meat-eater is just a joy to behold. But when you think of vegetarians, you of course must call to mind everything wrong with our great country: scrawny, hippie, dirty, shoeless, patchouli stench, KU. The vegetarian just gets old.

I grew up during a magical time in America, the 1980s. Ronald Reagan was our president, and the world found itself daily asking the question: Where's the beef? Well, the beef is in all of us. It's in the majestic rolling plains of southwest Kansas in the feedlots. It's in the magical mooing of cows, just before they reach the kill floor, and the peaceful silence that follows. It's in a medium-rare steak so delicious, it makes you think, "If killing a cow is wrong, I don't want to be right."

But it's not just beef that makes meat-eating far superior to bark-gnawing. In the pantheon of great slogans, "Pork – the other white meat" ranks near the apex. Bacon, pork chops, pork steak, ham – and those are just the parts high on the hog. And according to my own reasoning, if God didn't want us to eat pigs, he wouldn't have made them so delicious.

What meat is most fair? Fowl. I've been known to drive to Junction City just for the pleasure of Church's Chicken. Young children all over the country refuse to eat food other than chicken strips, the Chicken McNugget, the chicken sandwich and the greatest of all, the chicken fried steak. And what would Thanksgiving be without the glorious turkey? Sitting around with family, sharing the love of the holiday, napping off the tryptophan – all memories the veggie lover might never have.

In the immortal words of Bing Crosby, "A fish is an animal, who swims in a brook, he can't write his name or read a book, and to fool the people is his only thought, and though he's slippery he still gets caught."

If we give up eating meat, this trickster menace would go completely unchecked, catfish fries all over the world would be infinitely less fun, and people who live on the coasts would have one less thing to hold over our Midwestern heads.

The Second Amendment of the Constitution grants U.S. citizens the right to bear firearms. Since randomly shooting people is now frowned upon, those guns would go largely unused, and subsequently that right would be unexpressed without animals. One of the great American pastimes is hunting, with parents and children bonding and friends coming together not only for sport but to help control animal populations. It's a boon to small rural communities, both ecologically and economically. And most important, it's a boon to taste buds everywhere.

Available, delicious, fun, and non-communist – all words that go hand in hand with meat and America. God bless the USA.

Both sides of argument have valid health reasonings

KELSEY CHILDRESS

Ah, man as hunter. Is there an older representation of life and humans' place in the food chain? While some people claim the human body is not made to consume and digest meat, there is scientific proof that eating meat (chicken, beef, pork) is beneficial to humans. However, it is not required for survival.

Some people choose not to eat meat for religious or personal reasons. People for the Ethical Treatment of Animals, or PETA, lists a number of reasons why people should "go vegetarian" on its Web site, www.goveg.com. Some of these include: cruelty to animals, the ability of animals to feel pain, and the amount of preservatives and fats in meat products. PETA claims studies have shown that "vegetarians and vegans live, on average, six to 10 years longer than meat-eaters." We should have a choice whether or not to make meat part of our lifestyle.

Besides animal cruelty, many people go vegetarian for the environment, because producing meat products takes much of the country's national resources. According to a Web site from the Institute for Planetary Renewal titled 'Why Vegetarian?', "it takes about 2,500 gallons of water to produce a single pound of meat. In contrast, it takes only 25 gallons of water to produce a pound of wheat."

One concern vegans and vegetarians face is the lack of some vital nutrients, like protein and calcium.

"Nutrients are the problem," said Johanna Dwyer, a professor of nutrition and medicine at Tufts University in an article published by Time magazine in July 2003 about going vegetarian. But some pro-vegetarian lobbyists claim a heavy meat diet might provide too much protein and fat for a healthy human diet.

The meat-eating population is 65 percent overweight, 10 percent diabetic, and has higher cholesterol levels than vegetarians do, according to the McDougall Newsletter, an online newsletter published by Dr. John McDougall, of Santa Rosa, California.

There is a common misconception about vegetarians – they are often seen as "hippies" or weak because they do not eat meat, which is considered masculine and a symbol of humans' status as the "top animal" in the world. But eating meat might not actually be the best choice when it comes to masculinity.

Dr. McDougall also states, "During a man's reproductive years meat-eating decreases ejaculate volume, lowers sperm count, shortens sperm life, and causes poor sperm motility, genetic damage and infertility."

While it is a known fact that some people will never give up their steak and chicken, they should learn to respect those who live a vegan or vegetarian lifestyle.

There is scientific research promoting both sides of the issue, but when it comes down to it, eating meat is a personal choice that people have to make for themselves.

FEEDBACK

Collegian responds for last time of semester

Friday's To the Point column features the editorial board's favorite and least favorite Fourum comments throughout the week. The board members will state their opinions about selected Fourum comments.

"No, daddy. No."

This comment has been called into the Fourum at least once daily the entire semester. It has been spelled out, added to movie quotes and is usually accompanied with instructions to print. So, here's to you, obsessive callers.

"The revelation of the day: Marijuana is a Mexican word. Happy Cinco de Mayo."

Did you figure that out by taking a Spanish class at K-State? Some revelation.

"If you can't find your keys, should you be driving home? Just wondering."

No, caller. You are correct. We hope you said that to your friend, and not only to the Fourum.

"If you're not smart enough to open a door, maybe you're not smart enough to be at K-State. I mean, is there nothing else to write about on campus other than that the doors don't open in the right direction? Good God."

Other campus events were covered. Did you not see the other 11 pages of Thursday's paper?

K-State student from China combines East and West in displayed art

By Holly Campbell
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Despite creating artwork for many years, Yue Chen, the art department's lone Chinese graduate student, had her first solo art show this semester.

Chen, graduate student in fine arts, is originally from Hebei province in China. Before coming to K-State for her MFA, Chen, a ceramics artist, had already received a master's degree in art from the Art and Design College of Tsinghua University in China.

Chen said she decided to attend K-State after she was impressed with what she had heard about the university's ceramics program. Though she started in ceramics, Chen switched her focus to drawing after she took a figure drawing course and realized she had a serious interest in the art form.

Chen picked up on figure drawing coursework quickly and showed much skill in figure drawing and abstraction, Schmidt said.

Though she has been studying art for many years, Chen had her first solo art show, "Neither Here Nor There," in the K-State Student Union's Kemper Art Gallery from April 14–May 7.

The title was reminiscent of Chen stepping between two cultures – Chinese and American, Schmidt said.

Chen's abstract artwork might look different from other Chinese art, which usually emphasizes realism, Chen said.

"I kind of wanted something different," she said. "But still, my art is based on really representational art."

Chen often started a project by looking to her figure drawings for inspiration, and Chinese techniques also made their way into her work unintentionally, she said.

"You can tell all the brush work actually is related to my background of learning Chinese calligraphy and Chinese painting," she said.

Chen's work is interesting because of how it brings together American and Chinese styles, said Wei Wu, assistant professor of Chinese and director of K-State's Chinese language program.

"It is a nice East-West culture integration," Wu said.

An impressively wide range of media was used in Chen's work, Schmidt said. Chen's show was labeled as a collection of drawing, etching and silk mezzotint.

While her works appear to be abstract, Chen said she has something to say with all of her pieces.

"I'm trying to tell a story through my art, but the reason I'm into this abstraction is because viewers can always tell their own story," she said.

Chen's own story is depicted in a series of pieces titled "Rules and Me." In these pieces, Chen contrasted straight, rectangular shapes – representing rules – with flowing, freestyle lines and strokes – representing herself, she said.

Chen said she has enjoyed studying at K-State, where students are freer to speak as an equal with faculty than in China, she said.

"The thing that works for me is the connection between the student and the professor," she said.

Now that she has finished her master's degree, Chen said she would like to find a teaching job and get a few years of experience working in the United States before eventually returning to China.

Chen has already found admirers of her work, as the Department of Modern Languages at K-State has decided to purchase one of Chen's pieces, Wu said.

Chen is an incredibly accomplished student and is in a good position to find work, Schmidt said.

"She's one of the most skilled students I've worked with in years," she said.

KSU researchers helping to protect soldier's food

By Rebecca Perez
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State researchers are helping to make food safer for U.S. troops overseas.

Randy Phebus, professor of animal sciences and industry, and Dick Oberst, professor of diagnostic medicine and pathobiology, said they are working to confirm and expand research on food safety already done at the U.S. Army Natick Soldier Research Development and Engineering Center in Natick, Mass.

"What we are doing is using split samples to compare our data with them," Phebus said.

That means Natick is doing testing on certain types of food and K-State researchers are working to confirm their results. If there is a difference in the results, K-State examines the differences in procedures and then works to reproduce the conditions that led to the difference in results.

"The systems were never tested on all types of food at Natick," Phebus said.

K-State is now working with Natick to test all types of food. Since Phebus and Oberst are working with pathogens that are more complicated, they will be moving to a secure lab at K-State's Biosecurity Research Institute.

"We are working to make sure that the detection system works well, and then we will be working on improving procedures to improve sample handling and preparation," Phebus said.

The Department of Defense contributed $1.7 million to the research.

"Troop readiness can be greatly affected if there is an outbreak of food-borne illness," said Specialist Stephanie Hann, with the food safety department at the Irwin Community Hospital at Fort Riley.

"We recommend that soldiers don't eat off base when in Iraq or Afghanistan, but soldiers get tired of pre-packaged meals called MREs and sometimes take a chance and eat the local food," she said.

The Army food safety team has to train locals how long to keep food out, as well as proper handling techniques, Hann said.

Phebus said his research, in conjunction with research at Natick, will make Hann's job easier and her lab more effective at identifying pathogens in food.

CAMPUS CRIME

CDs, charger stolen

By Sarah Burford
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A cell phone charger and 50 to 60 CDs worth about $720 were stolen from a car parked at Bushnell Hall, according to a K-State Police press release.

Capt. Don Stubbings of K-State Police said the property was stolen between 6 p.m. Sunday and 9 p.m. Tuesday from a silver Chrysler Sebring. The car's window was open, and the car was parked in lot B-2 at Bushnell, Stubbings said.

No further damage was reported, and the police have no suspect information.

Stubbings encouraged people to keep doors and windows in both residences and vehicles locked. He said most thefts are "crimes of opportunity," in which suspects steal property that is in plain sight through open doors and windows.

K-State heads to OU for Big 12 matchup

By Mike DeVader
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State baseball team will hope to build off its home victory against No. 3 Arizona State as it travels to Norman, Okla., to face the Oklahoma Sooners tonight at 6:35 in its final Big 12 Conference road series.

The Wildcats (23-25, 7-14 Big 12) have some momentum heading into the three-game set after they were able to hold on to a one-run victory over the Sun Devils on Tuesday night at Tointon Family Stadium.

First baseman Justin Bloxom, who is a Phoenix, Ariz., native, had a little extra motivation and went 3-for-4 with two home runs and a triple; he ended the game with five RBIs.

Bloxom said he is looking forward to the Oklahoma series and hopes his team feels the same way heading into the final road conference set.

"We're hoping to play the same kind of ball and get some wins," Bloxom said. "Get a sweep."

The Sooners (29-20-1, 6-14-1 Big 12) are coming into their home stand with the Wildcats on a bit of a downer, trying to avoid their fourth-straight loss. Oklahoma has lost four of its last seven games, including a three-game sweep by the Kansas Jayhawks in its last series.

Coach Brad Hill said he hopes his team carries the momentum from two-straight wins to the Oklahoma series.

Hill said the team needs to be able to win on the road to be successful, and after winning five of its last 10 games – all against ranked opponents – there's no better time for the team to notch some solid road wins.

Just like Arizona State, the Sooners have a solid offense, though it didn't show in their recent series with KU. Hill said Oklahoma can still score a lot of runs.

"Offensively they're very good, and they put up good numbers at home," he said. "... they can get on a roll and put up good numbers."

Sophomore infielder Justin Bloxom swings at a pitch. Bloxom led the Wildcats to a 7-6 win over No. 3 Arizona State Tuesday.

ROWING

K-State to take 3 squads to 22-school regionals

By Brad Dornes
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State rowing team will travel to Oak Ridge, Tenn., May 17 to participate in the NCAA Central/South Regionals.

SWEENEY

During the two-day event, the Wildcats will face teams from 22 different schools. Some of the more notable teams there include Michigan State, Ohio State, Notre Dame, Texas and Kansas.

K-State will take both varsity crews to the event.

"I am very pleased with how the varsity boats have progressed throughout the season," said coach Patrick Sweeney. "They have raced hard and raced well in the last couple of events."

Along with the two varsity boats, K-State will also take the Novice 8 boat as well.

"The Novice 8 boat has shown improvement, but they will probably struggle with the competition at this event," Sweeney said. "I feel that they have earned the right to go and get the experience of a meet like regionals."

The Wildcats will have to place in the top five if they hope to make it to NCAA Rowing Championship on May 30.

"Usually the top 3 teams make it to nationals," Sweeney said. "The Central region is so deep that it is likely the top 5 will go on."

Since the squad is a young team and still relatively inexperienced, Sweeney said he is using the event as another building block for the future of the rowing team.

"This is a continuous process of getting this team experience and building towards the future," he said. "We have done everything right so far, and regionals will be a fun way to end the season if we have a few good races."

Writer reflects on transition from bystander to sports fan

WENDY HAUN

This column is a story is about a girl with an incredible sports lineage: her grandfather was a silver medalist in the Senior Olympics at age 84, her uncle played football for K-State, her father played intercollegiate sports and her mother probably could have pitched for K-State.

This girl, however, was the anomaly of the family – a small, undersized child with no significant amount of athletic ability whatsoever.

However, upon entering her freshman year at K-State, she became just the latest in a long line of family athletes when she joined the rowing team as a coxswain, the person in charge of navigating and steering the boat.

That girl is me.

I was never an athlete by any stretch of the imagination. Sure, I played soccer and softball when I was younger and also participated on a trick basketball team, but I was more likely to be hailed with "Best Spirit" than "Most Athletic." I put my heart and soul into sports, but they never gave me anything back.

Then, in 1998, I discovered something on a cold, December night. I discovered the K-State football team.

Football was always something the rest of my family embraced, but I detested it. I couldn't understand why anyone would stay cooped up in front of the TV watching something that would have no effect on their lives. On Dec. 31, 1997, while my family was frantically watching K-State beat Syracuse in the Fiesta Bowl, I was holed up in my aunt's basement, reading a book. I remember being annoyed because they were making too much noise.

Less than a year later, I was making just as much noise as them. While I watched K-State lose to Texas A&M in the Big 12 Championship, something clicked. That night, I became a full-fledged football fan.

It has not been an easy road. Going from having no knowledge of the sport to writing about it 10 years later has been difficult at times. I still don't completely know all of the schemes, all of the players' histories or even the mystique that is behind NFL football, but I know enough to get by and not look like an idiot in the paper.

I'm eight days away from graduation, and I still don't know where I'm going, what teams I'll be covering or what I'm going to do. I do know one thing: It will involve sports.

After 15 years of trying to resist, I finally gave in to my one true passion. My advice to everyone is just to find that passion and embrace it. Hopefully, you will all be as lucky to do their passion for a living – not just as a hobby.

Wendy Haun is graduating and not sure what she's going to do yet. However, the thought of living somewhere that doesn't worship the purple is scary. Please send comments to sports@spub.ksu.edu.

Track finishes regular season at Nebraska open, hopes to prepare for postseason

By Joel Aschbrenner
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The track and field team will compete Saturday at Lincoln, Neb., in the Nebraska Invitational, the Wildcats' last regular season event before the Big 12 Conference Outdoor Championships.

Only 13 Wildcats from the women's team and 14 from the men's team will travel to the meet. For those competing, however, the meet will provide important preparation for the conference meet, which starts May 16 in Boulder, Colo.

Senior high jumper Lamar Garrett said the meet will be important for him personally, because he has been struggling with his technique and hopes to fix the problem before competing in the conference meet.

"For me, it's very important," Garrett said. "I'm trying to get out of a rut, so I'm trying to set the tone for next week."

The Nebraska Invitational will also be important, Garrett said, because it is the last opportunity to gain confidence before the conference meet.

"When you're jumping well, you know what you can do, and when you're jumping bad, you question yourself," he said.

Senior Morgan Bonds, who will compete in the 800-meter run, said the meet will not be as competitive as some other meets, but it will give her an opportunity to work on her race plan to get the times she wants.

"It's really good for preparation," Bonds said of the meet. "Obviously, it's not going to be a real competitive meet, but it's good to get those last little kinks worked out and get ready for the Big 12 meet."

The Wildcats will have the luxury of competing at a familiar track before the conference meet, as the invitational will be the second time the Wildcats have competed at Nebraska in the outdoor season and the fifth time this year.

"It's getting pretty routine," Garrett said.

Not only will the Wildcats get the benefit of competing at a familiar facility the week before the conference meet, but they will also get to practice for the NCAA Midwest Regional, which is also in Lincoln.

Bonds said this experience should be a big advantage for the runners.

"It's easier to go in when you know what the curves are like and what the straights are like, and things like that," she said. "It's going to be really advantageous when the regional meet comes on, because us, Nebraska and a few Big 12 schools in our region are really the only ones who have been there, so we will have that advantage going into the regional meet."

After competing in Lincoln on Saturday, the Wildcats will head to Boulder next weekend for the three-day conference meet. Then on May 30-31, the 31 Wildcats who have earned regional qualifying marks will compete in the Midwest Regional Championships in Lincoln.

The NCAA championships will be June 11-14 at Drake University in Des Moines, Iowa, another track the Wildcats have already competed at this season.

Graduating senior reflects at Alumni Association's send-off event

ADRIANNE DEWEESE

Maybe it is only appropriate that the last article I write for the Collegian is about Senior Send-Off.

The event took place from 4-6 p.m. Thursdsay on the K-State Alumni Center's Johnson Terrace. Several classmates and I arrived at 3:45 p.m. and waited in line for the T-shirts that were given to the first 700 graduates. May, August and December 2008 graduates attended the free event.

While eating food and talking with some friends, a boy that I have known since kindergarten came up and talked with me for a few moments. Raymond and I graduated from Wamego High School in 2004, but I have only seen him a handful of times in the years since. Raymond and I caught up for a bit – he's getting married this summer, and he plans to take the LSAT sometime, too. Several familiar faces also surrounded me at the send-off.

As we waited for the 5:30 p.m. drawing of names for prizes (and no, I didn't win any), several Collegian members and myself sat in West Stadium and relaxed. It might have been the first time all week that I've had personal reflection time. I looked across the field of Old Stadium, and all I could think about was where four years had gone.

Sometimes, we get caught up in the little parts of life – worrying about a five-page paper, oversleeping and missing a class or finding a parking spot. And then it's summertime, and we enjoy the break until the cycle starts again. Only this time, after next week, it's over.

Among the display tables at Senior Send-Off, Career and Employment Services distributed a book called "Life After School. Explained." Yours truly will spend many hours with the book, learning about topics like mutual funds, what wines to drink on business dinner meetings and developing a good credit record.

But the book's more important lesson appears on the second page. The following quote appears in the 1989 film "Dead Poets Society." Robin Williams' character John Keating spoke the following: "That the powerful play goes on and you may contribute a verse. What will your verse be?"

To the 2008 graduates, I'll ask you the same question: What will your verse be after we leave K-State?

With that, my writing career at the Kansas State Collegian is done.

Former representative hopes to contend for U.S. Senate

By Owen Kennedy
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Problems that worry voters and the reason those problems have not been solved are partially due to national politicians who are unwilling to seek bipartisan solutions, a candidate for U.S. Senate said.

Former Congressman Jim Slattery is a Democratic candidate vying for current Republican senator Pat Robert's seat. Slattery was on campus Thursday and articulated his campaign platform of national security, the economy, energy and health care.

"National security should be the first priority of the federal government," Slattery said.

He said the government has lost concentration on fighting al-Qaida and Osama bin Laden with the war in Iraq.

"It's costing $12 billion a month in Iraq, and I think it's important for students at Kansas State and taxpayers all over Kansas to realize that we're spending that much money," he said. "That to me is unbelievable. Both houses of Congress utterly failed in their Constitutional duty to check and balance the executive branch of government [by approving the war]. It is important that we get out of Iraq as quickly as possible and we have to do so responsibly."

Slattery said the war in Iraq is a large contributor to an unstable economy and that he did not agree with the current fiscal policy.

"In 2001, we were talking about paying off the national debt," he said. "Instead we've

CYCLE CASA to raise money for abused children

By Sarah Burford
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Sunflower CASA Project will have its annual CYCLE CASA event on May 10 to raise money for abused and neglected children.

CASA (Court Appointed Special Advocates for children) is an organization that assigns volunteers to help children who are going to court for abuse or neglect. The volunteers learn more about the children's situations and then share that information with the state-appointed attorneys representing the children.

"Volunteers serve as their voice in the court," said Jennifer Anguiano, advocate supervisor for the Sunflower CASA Project.

CYCLE CASA is an annual bicycling event that raises money through corporation sponsorships and registration fees from bicyclists. This is the event's ninth year in existence.

Participants can choose to ride the 10-mile route to Keats, Kan., the 30-mile route to Riley, Kan., or the 100-kilometer route.

"We encourage people to come out no matter what their experience is," said Jayme Morris-Hardeman, executive director of the Sunflower CASA Project. "It's not limited to those who are extremely serious cyclists."

Morris-Hardeman said participants come with a variety of bikes, including tandem and turn-of-the-century bigwheel bikes. She said the event is for all ages, and there are usually about 100 participants.

Anguiano said the money raised during this event will be used to train volunteers to work with the abused and neglected children who are entering the court system. Morris-Hardeman said the organization raised about $14,000 through CYCLE CASA last year.

"Along with being a fundraiser, it brings awareness to the community as to what CASA is all about," Anguiano said.

CASA is a nationwide organization that started in Seattle 1977. The Sunflower Project began in 1988, and includes Riley, Clay and Pottowatomie counties, Anguiano said. There are only three attorneys in the area who hear child-abuse cases, which amounted to about 150 cases last year. She said these attorneys also have their own private practices, so they need the help of CASA volunteers to understand the children's situations.

"Those people are covering all those cases, which is a lot to ask them to do," Morris-Hardeman said. "There are always more kids coming into the system that need advocates."

Dave Colburn, manager at The Pathfinder, said he has helped CASA set up the CYCLE CASA routes since the event began. He said he likes working with CASA because it puts him in a good mood to know he is helping kids and likes the casual, laid-back atmosphere.

"It's not a race, it's just a ride," Colburn said. "Just pedal at your own speed and enjoy the ride."

CYCLE CASA participants may register on May 10, the day of the event, from 7 a.m. to 8 a.m. at Frank Anneberg Park, shelter one. Riders participating in the shorter routes may register until noon. The adult registration fee is $40, and the fee for children ages 15 and younger is $20. The 100 km ride will have a mass start at 8 a.m. CASA will provide lunch and snacks along the routes.

TO THE EDITOR

Paper should set higher level of story decency

Editor,

The appearance of the latest article by Matt Combes has led me to finally make some statement regarding the content of the Collegian.

I can understand why those who are experiencing "journalistic freedom" for the first time would feel the need to push the envelope, but I cannot understand why the Collegian feels the need to repeatedly publish such disgusting articles related to sexual behavior.

Does this help or benefit our students in some way? I find it ironic that while these sex articles run, the Collegian chooses to emphasize the AIDS/HIV crisis here and around the world.

I would hope a higher standard could be set for your publication and that disgusting articles such as these do not appear in the future. Just because you can say it, doesn't mean you should.

Sanitizer story thoughtful, but needed more research

Editor,

While I applaud Krystle Richard's attempt at bringing food safety to the forefront, I implore her to do some research before publication.

Firstly, E. coli O157:H7 is not a common strain found in ground beef. In fact, the USDA has deemed it an adulterant in ground beef. Secondly, Salmonella is not the most common bacterium found in chicken. The FDA estimates that up to 100 percent of chicken contain Campylobacter jejuni, which is also the leading cause of bacterial foodborne illness in the United States. And finally, the most important bacterium with regards to handwashing is Staph. aureus, a microbe not mentioned in the article. The FDA also estimates that at least 50 percent of the population harbor S. aureus, making sanitation extremely important.

Please continue to alert the public to important issues like hand-washing and proper cooking, but make sure your facts are correct.

Counselor serves as campus asset to many

By Jasmine Hammond

Director and professor of counseling services, Fred Newton, has worked with college students for more than 20 years. Newton came to K-State in 1988 from the University of Missouri at Columbia.

Fred Newton, director and professor of counseling services, has quietly served K-State students in need for more than 30 years.

The Ohio native started as a teacher at the University of Georgia but received his doctorate from the University of Missouri at Columbia. When choosing a career path, Newton said he wanted to work with college students.

"I saw there was a job opportunity at K-State, and I took it," Newton said during an interview in his office in the English and Counseling Services building. "It looked like it fit me."

Newton said when he came to K-State, the counseling services department was not one, cohesive unit. In 1988, K-State combined all the counseling services into one department, in one building.

Newton is also a tenured faculty member.

"There is so much variety in my work," Newton said. "I'm not a traditional counselor."

Newton said he enjoys working with college students and counseling them. He also said college is an important time in students' lives for making decisions.

He also works with K-State athletes by helping them deal with the pressures of school and any other outside issues.

Newton has consulted and conducted workshops with several colleges and universities on issues related to college student personnel services and has presented more than 60 research papers at professional conferences.

He is active in research and has also published more than 50 articles and book chapters on topics related to college student personnel services in several respected publications, including the Journal of Counseling Psychology.

Bill Arck, director of alcohol and other drug education services, has worked with Newton for 27 years.

Along with being counselors, the two also have taught classes together.

"He's a great therapist and an outstanding classroom teacher," Arck said.

Arck said Newton has had a large effect on his staff and he allows and encourages his staff to pursue their own interests when it comes to counseling a variety of students.

"He is a genuine, real-deal kind of guy," Arck said. "What you see is what you get."

Phillips puts family 1st

By Mark Savoy
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

With one year until his four-year term as Manhattan City Commissioner ends, Tom Phillips has a lot on his mind. Phillips is not only a city commissioner, but also a dedicated father who runs his own consulting firm at Phillips & Associates.

Phillips grew up in Fort Scott, Kan., where he said he felt life was good to him as he grew up. In his youth, Phillips played baseball and later played basketball in high school.

"When I was younger, I tried to play golf, and I was terrible," Phillips chuckled. "I had a bad slice and would grow quickly frustrated. I decided it wasn't for me."

Phillips contends he has always been a hard worker. Phillips was a newspaper boy and then began working at a kitchen in the local hospital when he was 16. During college, Phillips worked at Wal-Mart.

"I guess work was always part of my ethical values," he said.

Phillips earned his bachelor's degree in 1980 and his master's in 1983, both of which he earned at K-State. After finishing school, Phillips worked as the director of city planning in Lenexa, Kan. Phillips resigned from the position after eight years and moved back to Manhattan in 1992.

It was then that he started Phillips & Associates. Phillips works with small towns and counties in both Kansas and Missouri, helping them plan communities.

According to the City of Manhattan's Web site, Phillips served on the Manhattan Urban Area Planning Board from 1995 to 2003. In 2005, he was elected a city commissioner.

"I ran because I thought that there were some missed long-term opportunities for growth and development in the community," Phillips said. "I wanted to strengthen the ties between the residential, business, and university side of the community."

Phillips has focused on those ties, but also notes other pressing matters in the region.

"The most pressing issue [for Manhattan] is being able to accommodate the growth demands on the community, and by that I mean the expansion and soldiers at Fort Riley," he said. "We as a city have to build more [infrastructure], accommodate growth without a tax burden and make sure Manhattan maintains its high quality of life. I think that's a real struggle for the city commission. [Also], we need to continue to think about long term implications of sustainability, rising oil and its effects on the average taxpayer and household, and how our city grows."

Phillips' term ends in April 2009, and he said he does not know if he will run again.

Phillips said his family is most important to him, and he feels his proudest accomplishment is not starting his consulting firm or receiving any titles or honors, but rather that he is a good father and role model for his children and a loving and supporting husband for his wife, Debra.

Union employee reflects on job, where he would rather be

Michael Claussen, freshman in open option and an employee at the copy center in the K-State Student Union, works on the color printer Wednesday afternoon.

Matt Binter
COLLEGIAN

By Whitney Hodgin
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Michael Claussen, freshman in open option, is an employee at the K-State Student Union Copy Center.

When and why did you start working here?
I started last August. I just wanted a job on campus, so I applied lots of places. A friend's dad works here, so that helped.

Is the end of the year busier than others?
More than normal, there are lots of people coming in with final projects, which we print off and bind.

What's your least favorite part of this job?
I don't like wire-binding books because it's really easy to mess them up. There are a lot of requests around this time because people want their projects bound.

What do you want students to know about the copy center?
This isn't the ID center. A lot of students come in thinking it is.

What would you rather be doing than working at the copy center?
I'd rather be doing anything than working. I'd probably be watching TV at my girlfriend's house.

What other services does the copy center offer?
We can make posters, brochures and class booklets.

Do more students come in, or teachers?
About the same amount of students and teachers use our services.

Are people more demanding before and during finals week?
You can tell people are stressed, but none are necessarily rude.

How many hours do you work?
I work 11 hours a week, Monday, Wednesday and Friday afternoons.

Children face problems without Army father

By Rebecca Perez
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Angelique Stevens was left at home with her two children, Erin and Thomas, when her husband Michael left for Iraq in February 2007. At first, Angelique was the only one who was upset, but within a few months of her father leaving, though, Erin started to develop behavioral problems.

Angelique was called to her daughter's school after she bit another girl. Soon after, Angelique was called to the school again, but this time for her son.

Angelique's son, Thomas, had been at a friend's house playing when Thomas and his friend decided to play pirates. The boys decided to pretend to hang one of the pirates, which led to Thomas having a red mark on his neck.

The next day, Thomas decided to make up a story to tell his classmates when asked about the red mark on his neck. He told his friends his mom had choked him for misbehaving.

Angelique got a call asking her to come in because there was a problem with Thomas. She was confronted by police when she got there.

She was able to explain the situation by calling the father of the boy Thomas had been playing with, and she was no longer in trouble.

This led to counseling for the entire family within 24 hours of Thomas' incident. Angelique said she was "at her wits' end."

"The counseling didn't help all that much," Angelique said. "The therapist said that everything was normal. I really think the support group they had at school did more good than the counseling.

"I told the kids after the session was over that it was all right to be sad and angry, but it's not all right to take it out on other people."

She said even little signs of the children's father helped.

"The kids really started feeling better once they got a letter from Dad. Then we took a long vacation over the summer, and that really helped as well," she said.

Now that Michael is back from Iraq, Angelique said the kids are ecstatic.

"I think it's great to have my dad back," Thomas said. "I get to spend more time with him. I didn't have anyone to do things with. The place was always full of girls. I feel happy to have my dad home, but he could really use a vacation. We only have five days left of school, and then we are going on a road trip to Florida."

Michael's daughter said she was equally excited.

"I loved my dad coming home, but it was also sad because we had to get rid of our dog, Indy," Erin said.

Indy was a rescue dog the Stevens got after Michael left for Iraq. When Michael came home, Indy tried to bite him. The family learned the dog did not like Michael, so Indy had to be taken to a shelter.

"It was hard that I couldn't see my dad for a year, but then [his deployment] got extended to 15 months," Erin said. "The support group at school was nice because you could tell your feelings and get them out instead of keeping them trapped inside. Mrs. Hardy (a teacher) would ask us questions about how often our parents called."

Riley County new home sale prices differ from national 13-year low

By Adrianne DeWeese
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

New home sale prices in Riley County increased from 2006-07, a trend that differs from a 13-year low in new home sales in the U.S.

The average sale price of a new home built in 2006 in Riley County was $184,865. In 2007, the average sale price of a new home built increased about 11 percent to $207,633, according to the Riley County Appraiser's Office. Riley County is historically a high-demand, relatively low-supply area for housing, said Greg McHenry, Riley County appraiser.

"Compared to national markets, we're still a relatively stable economy," McHenry said. "Our community and our area is growing in population while much of the state of Kansas and also some national areas have stable population or are losing population in some areas."

The U.S. median sale price of new houses sold in February 2008 was $244,100; the average sale price was $296,400, according to a U.S. Census Bureau and U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development March 26 press release.

The median sale price of new houses sold in March 2008 was $227,600; the average sale price was $292,200, according to a U.S. Census Bureau and U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development April 24 press release. New residential sales data for April 2008 will be released on May 27.

Since real-estate transactions take place locally, national trends don't necessarily apply for any particular state or community, said Tom Brungardt, executive officer of Manhattan Association of Realtors. Brungardt, a retired high-school teacher from Junction City, has been involved with real estate for about a year and a half.

"We (the Manhattah community) shouldn't have the ups and downs the way other communities have had them," he said. "National trends tend to be based on data selected from a few urban areas. Our home prices do not necessarily reflect the national trend."

Daniel Kuester, assistant professor of economics, said he is not surprised that Riley County new home sale trends differ from national trends. While the average and median sale prices differ in measurements, Kuester said both numbers are comparable as trend indicators.

"I think that most of the people here are buying them as primary residence as opposed to buying it as an investment, except for those who are buying them to rent them out," Kuester said. "That being said, there are a lot of pretty high-end homes that are sitting unsold in Manhattan. With Fort Riley and with K-State, you've got a stable employment base here, so you're gong to be less susceptible to trends here than nationwide."

People that buy homes as a secondary residence – or "flipping houses," as it is more commonly known – often buy the homes without conducting research about housing sale prices, Kuester said. He said this phenomenon is less likely in areas like Manhattan because of a more stable population.

"Midwestern ethic is in buying properties that people actually will use. For one, the potential profits were probably greater in some cities with flipping houses," Kuester said. "People probably have speculated on homes in Manhattan, but I think it tends to be more a phenomenon in larger cities."

Previous ease of obtaining credit and a lack of regulation on lending processes are likely causes of the national 13-year low in new home sales, Kuester said. High-risk loans were bundled into securities that were given an unfair premium – in other words, people bought securities that were not as safe at they were supposed to be, Kuester said.

"We have all of these folks who have borrowed money that maybe weren't the best equipped to own the type of home that they purchased," he said. "It is a bit of a bubble where people are overextending themselves and buying more home than they can afford. You've got people who count on the prices of homes to go up, and it's simply not happening."

Falling home prices serve as a double-edged sword, said National Association of Home Builders chief economist David Seiders in a March 26 CNN.com report.

"Affordability of homes needs to be restored, but some prospective buyers stay away because they believe home prices will continue to go down further," Seiders said in the report.

Existing-home sales in the U.S. also have been an unstable market during the last several months, according to the National Association of Realtors. The National Association of Realtors is the largest U.S. trade association, representing more than 1 million members involved in all aspects of residential and commercial real-estate industries.

Little change is expected in existing-home sales during the next several months, but the market will come into clearer focus this summer, according to an April 8 National Association of Realtors press release. The aggregate existing-home price will probably reach a median of $215,800 for all of 2008 before it rises to $223,800 in 2009.

Regional improvement is expected in the Northeast and the oil-patch states of Texas, Oklahoma, Louisiana and Arkansas, said Lawrence Yun, NAR chief economist, in the release.

According to the National Association of Realtors, inflation, as measured by the Consumer Price Index, is projected at 3.4 percent in 2008 and 2.2 percent in 2009.

Nationally, the median new-home price will probably fall 3.6 percent to $238,400 in 2008, and then rise 4.0 percent to $247,800 in 2009, according to the National Association of Realtors.

In the economy as a whole, the wealth effect occurs when many people use their homes as a source of equity, which is a nationwide decreasing trend, Kuester said.

"People have been borrowing off the value of their homes to come up with wealth," he said. "It's being done on the expectation that homes will continue to appreciate or go up in price. Their home is probably not going to reach that value in the near future, so they're going to overextend their credit."

Kuester also said people who now buy homes as a residence and have fixed interest rates won't feel the effects of the recession.

"I don't think this is a bad time to buy, personally, particularly if you're buying a primary residence," he said. "That's a long-term investment that I think – particularly here in Riley County – things will be all right over a longer period of time."

DRESS | Tubby's manager says dress code is to maintain bar's appearance with the way some young African-American men dress. Baker said it would be interesting to see if bouncers targeted any particular group more than another.

"Is it consistent," she said, "or are they targeting young African-Americans?"

Candi Hironaka, co-chair of Cultural Community Harmony Week and associate director of Leadership Studies Programs, said she does not know a significant amount about the dress codes. She frequents Aggieville for lunch but has only been there in the evening a couple of times since she moved to Manhattan.

She said she would support a group of students setting up a meeting with the bar owners to ask them about their dress codes.

"I really think it raises the question of personal freedom," Hironaka said. "For me, it's something that we should ask the bar owners why they have this."

DISCRIMINATION COMPLAINTS

Despite the exclusive nature of the bars' dress codes, no discrimination complaints were filed in Manhattan during 2007.

According to the Kansas Human Rights Commission annual report for 2007, only two bars in Kansas faced complaints last year. One was in Wichita and the other in Topeka, neither were based on dress codes.

Ruth Glover, KHRC assistant director, said dress codes might keep out certain clientele or target certain people.

She said KHRC protects certain classes against discrimination, including race, religion, gender, disability, age, national origin and ancestry.

These classes are protected in the areas of employment, public accommodation, housing and profiling in conjunction with traffic stops. The area of complaint a person would have about bar dress codes would fall under public accommodation. Manhattan didn't have any public accommodations complaints in 2007.

Glover said there has not been a case that tests dress codes yet.

"In order to file a complaint with us, the person has to present that the crime looked, [on the surface, to be discriminatory]," Glover said.

"If we thought there was probable cause that someone has discriminated in the area of public accommodation, then I believe they could be [sentenced to] a $2,000 humiliation finding," Glover said.

A letter of apology or a refund of charges were assessed might also be awarded to the victim.

Larry Hackney, Manhattan human resources specialist, said the rules are only discriminatory based on their enforcement.

He said if a person who is not targeted by the dress code enters the public place violating a rule and the rule is enforced, then "there's less reason to think they're discriminatory."

Hackney said much investigation and analysis goes into discrimination complaints.

"I suppose no one has tested [dress code] rules to see if they violate some law. Typically, if somebody believes that they have been the victim of discrimination and they file a complaint and those complaints are investigated, they look for certain kinds of evidence to support the claim of discrimination," Hackney said. "That would have to be determined by a qualified investigator. It may be found to have a discriminatory impact or it may not."

Atchity said the only goal of Tubby's dress code is to show class.

"It's just a rule," he said. "I guess when I sit down and eat dinner I don't want people with cut off shirts and for people to have their shirts off – it's just a rule."

SLATTERY | Former 2nd Dsitrict Rep. voices concerns over war in Iraq

added 3.5 trillion to the national debt that your generation will have to pay off."

He said fiscal responsibility has not been a priority in Washington, D.C., which is one of his biggest concerns.

"This is an outrageous fiscal policy, it is a reckless fiscal policy, and it is a fiscal policy that I call intergenerational robbery," he said. "One of the sharpest differences I have with Sen. Roberts is that he basically voted for this fiscal policy."

Fiscal irresponsibility has caused the value of the dollar to weaken by 30 to 40 percent, Slattery said. He said he supports extending some of the Bush tax cuts but he wanted to make sure the benefits were fair to those who need the tax cut.

A weak dollar has contributed to higher oil and gas prices, Slattery said, and foreign energy is not the future for American policy. He said he was open-minded about solutions to the American demand for energy.

"Ethanol is part of the solution, wind is part of the solution, solar is a possibility, but they're not the only solution," he said.

Slattery said all possibilities should be considered, even nuclear energy.

"I'm willing to look at nuclear as part of the solution," he said. "The French have used nuclear successfully and safely."

He said Wolf Creek Nuclear Generating Station, near Burlington, Kan., is an example of safer nuclear power in the U.S. and Kansas.

Though two proposed power plants were successfully vetoed by Gov. Kathleen Sebelius, Slattery said Kansans are already familiar with the possibility of coal as a source of energy.

"Over the long term, we're going to have to learn how to burn coal cleanly," he said. "In Kansas we're going to have to have coal-powered electric facilities. As we move forward, coal is going to have to be part of our solution."

Slattery said health care is an issue that must be solved sooner rather than later, and the first step is affordability. He said he supported the State Children's Health Insurance Program while in the House of Representatives, and he said he thinks the program should be expanded to insure children whose parents still cannot afford proper care.

He said his campaign will not participate in negative campaigning and expects a respectful race.

"We're going to conduct a positive, issue-oriented campaign," he said.

Slattery said he is aware of the demand for a change in politics, and he agrees with that sentiment.

"We're offering real choice in this campaign," he said. "If people want change, I'm their man."

Matt Binter | COLLEGIAN

Jim Slattery, candidate for U.S. Senate, supports making national security a larger priority along with fiscal responsibility in response to the debt accumulated because the Iraq war.

JUST A NOTE

Music affects lives most

ADRIANNE DEWEESE

"Meet you all the way, meet you all the way, Rosanna yeah."

Toto, a Grammy award-winning rock band that formed in the late 1970s, is one of the earliest bands I remember hearing, with songs like "Rosanna" and "Africa." My sister and I would listen to a cassette tape as my dad drove us around in his truck.

Music has always played a significant part in my life, and I consider it one of life's most wonderful blessings. There are few moments more intimate than when an artist takes the stage and strums notes on a guitar or releases vocals into a microphone. Goosebumps often graze my skin when I hear a live musical act because of the emotion that fills the room.

Regardless of the genre, songs allow for the personal expression of singers and songwriters in a four- or five-minute span. So many different elements are incorporated into a song – verses must flow together into a story and the chorus serves as a link between verses. Some might say the most important aspect of a song is its key. Keys can be either major or minor, with minor keys producing a sadder sound. Particular chord progressions throughout a song establish its mood and tone. These moods and tones must reflect and work with the overall theme projected through the lyrics.

Sometimes we listen to music as "background noise," but we rarely think about the raw, stripped down endeavor musicians undertake when they are on stage. Consider this scenario: Take your most prized possession or talent. Imagine projecting it to hundreds, thousands or millions of people. Some like it, and they remain loyal through the years. Now, imagine hundreds of people disliking your product or possession, even though they have very little knowledge of what you do. This is the life of musicians.

One of my most valued music-related memories took place last summer after my best friend and I attended a show at the Granada Theater in Lawrence. We mostly went to hear two of our favorite musical artists, Straylight Run and Sparta, which we had previously seen in separate shows before their Granada performancees. While Straylight Run and Sparta both performed respectable sets, my best friend and I also discovered a new group that we now love – the opening act, Lovedrug.

Lovedrug lead singer and songwriter Michael Shepard is incredibly dedicated to its music. In an April 25, 2007, blog entry on the band's Web site, Shepard wrote that his natural instinct isn't as an entertainer. As an unusually quiet child, he said his "salvation" came when he discovered music and found an emotional outlet.

Shepard isn't alone in his quest to find himself in music. As a child who lacked athletic coordination, the piano and the clarinet were my tools of trade in junior high and high school.

Bob Marley once said, "One good thing about music – when it hits, you feel no pain." But, music does let you feel pain – it lets you feel whatever emotion you desire. That is its beauty. But no one knows the emotion of a song more than the person who penned it. Let us, the listeners, never forget that.

Adrianne DeWeese is a senior in print journalism and criminology. She plans to pursue a writing career, but her "secret" aspiration is playing keyboard and singing back-up vocals in a band. Please send comments to edge@spub.ksu.edu.

Top 8 of 2008

Several events signified spring semester

We're five months into the "new" year and a few neat events and items have already made the year one to remember. Here is my list of the top eight movies, products, restaurants, movements events and CDs that have made their way into 2008. They are in no particlar order of preference.

ALEX PEAK

Alex Peak is a fifth-year student in journalism, international studies and French. She is totally, TOTALLY done with school.

8 "JUNO"

Though it technically came out in late December 2007, all of the fireworks surrounding the movie shot off in 2008. How often is it that a movie written by a 20-something-year-old stripper named Diablo that's centered around the misadventures of teen pregnancy gets such esteem and cult followings across most U.S. demographics?

7 VITAMIN-ENRICHED WATER

Flavorful, flavorless, bursting with energy or calorie free, these vitamin-plus-water drinks are crawling out of the woodworks. This beverage genre isn't a recent invention, but it seems to have taken off with umpteen brands, varieties and benefits. I used to feel guilty drinking plain tap water, but now it's nearly a crime to drink just purified water. Are you really missing out of on 5,000 of your daily vitamins?

6 WRITERS' STRIKE

Thank God for the end of the writers' strike. We're Americans, and we demand to be entertained - and reruns don't count. The three month, one-week strike was almost more than we could handle. Without shows like "South Park" and AMC's "Breaking Bad," which weren't affected by the strike, viewers might not have made it through the three-month long stagnancy.

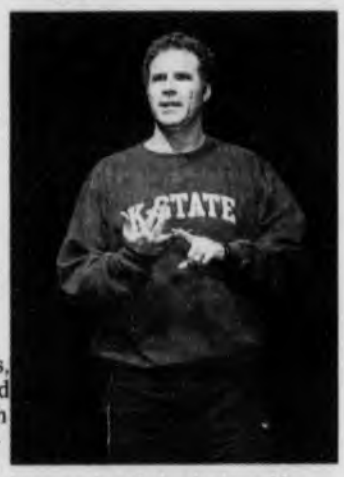
5 VAMPIRE WEEKEND'S NEW CD

Vampire Weekend's debut album "Vampire Weekend" has a refreshing punk sound with some poppy, entertaining lyrics. Described as indie, afro-pop rock, the band was declared the year's best new band by Spin magazine and artist of the week by MTV. The band's tunes are comparable with the sounds of Hot Chip and Tokyo Police Club.

4 GOIN' GREEN

Campus organizations and departments seem to be taking the environmentally friendly approach much more to heart this semester. With rallies, incentives and give-aways students and faculty are stressing the importance of recycling, reducing and

3 BIG MOMMA'S GRILL



With an endless supply of French fries and enough food to fuel a small country, Big Momma's Grill does a body good. Nestled inside of PJ's Bar in Aggieville, it's the perfect location for hungry bargoers. If you come on the right night, you can enjoy a drag queen show, heavy metal and other live entertainment acts.

2 GRAND THEFT AUTO 4

The ultra-addicting video game series Grand Theft Auto has released its newest addition: GTA4: Liberty City. In no other situation can you rob banks, beat hookers, shoot cops, fly helicopters and blow things up so easily and only have to start the game over if you're caught.

1 WILL FERRELL

Will Ferrell's campus appearance as part of the "Funny or Die Comedy Tour Presented by Semi-Pro" was a treat for students and the community. The best part of the show – other than the goofy sidekicks, Ferrell's Jazzy antics, movement pants and Ugg boots, and Zach Galifianakis, Demetri Martin and Nick Swardson – was the hammerhead shark signed by Buzz Aldrin and Ron Burgundy. K-State students won the trophy shark for having the most students sign up for the "Funny or Die" Facebook application.

MOVIE REVIEW

'Iron Man' an exciting start to summer movie season

"Iron Man"

Review by Brendan Praeger

To combat the declining quality of comic book movies in the past few years, Marvel Comics decided to finance its own films, rather than watch major studios churn out more mediocre efforts.

"Iron Man," the first film produced by Marvel Studios, proves the company made a good decision.

The movie follows weapons designer Tony Stark, who builds an armored suit while held captive by terrorists in the Middle East. After shooting his way to freedom, he returns to Los Angeles and builds an upgraded version of his ultimate weapon.

The story isn't particularly different from other superhero movies, and most of the twists and events are fairly predictable. What "Iron Man" lacks in originality, though, it more than makes up for with personality.

Casting Robert Downey Jr. as egotistical weapons mogul Tony Stark might go down as one of the greatest casting decisions of all time. His character is far from the Boy Scout we see in many comic book adaptations. He womanizes, drinks and sidesteps any moral dilemma that might come his way when selling weapons to various armies.

His character is more fun to watch than any superhero in recent memory. Director Jon Favreau seems to have turned Vince Vaughn's character in "Swingers" into a full-blown action star.

The rest of the cast is also well-chosen. Gwyneth Paltrow plays Stark's loyal assistant, Terrence Howard plays a military adviser who might turn up as a villain in the sequel, and Jeff Bridges, "The Big Lebowski" himself, plays a spurned partner from Stark's company.

Favreau has an unimpressive directorial résumé including stinkers like "Zathura: A Space Adventure," "Elf," and "Made." However, he keeps "Iron Man" moving at a healthy pace with appropriate comedy and satisfying action.

The movie's biggest flaws come from its status as the first film in a franchise. Stark spends a bit too much time toying with his suit and not enough time blowing things up with it. It never becomes a waiting game for an unsatisfying payoff, like "Hulk" or "Superman Returns," but it does slow down a bit too much in the second act.

Despite its flaws, "Iron Man" succeeds as a summer blockbuster, as well as a setup for a promising franchise. Be sure to stay after the credits for an excellent cameo by Samuel L. Jackson and a glimpse at a future plot line.

CELEBRITY NEWS

MICHAEL & DINA LOHAN ENGAGE IN WAR OF WORDS OVER MOM AWARD

On Wednesday, Mingling Moms admitted honoring Dina Lohan as a "Top Mom" brought them a wave of criticism, but it appears it is her ex-husband who shouted the loudest.

Michael Lohan branded the organization "a joke," in the New York Post's Page 6, for bestowing the honor upon Dina.

"Are you kidding," he said. "Top celebrity mom? Look at her off-screen antics, her lack of morals and how she conducts herself. I guess they forgot to mention how this top supermom leaves her kids alone at night and even parties in their presence. Just wait until we go back to court."

Michael claimed his ex misses therapy meetings and has a penchant for partying.

"She comes stumbling out of Butter at 3:15 AM with bloodshot eyes and a red runny nose, yelling 'Oh, [bleep],' when she saw the paparazzi," Michael said.

MINNIE DRIVER ANSWERS THE QUESTION: WHO'S YOUR BABY DADDY (SORT OF)

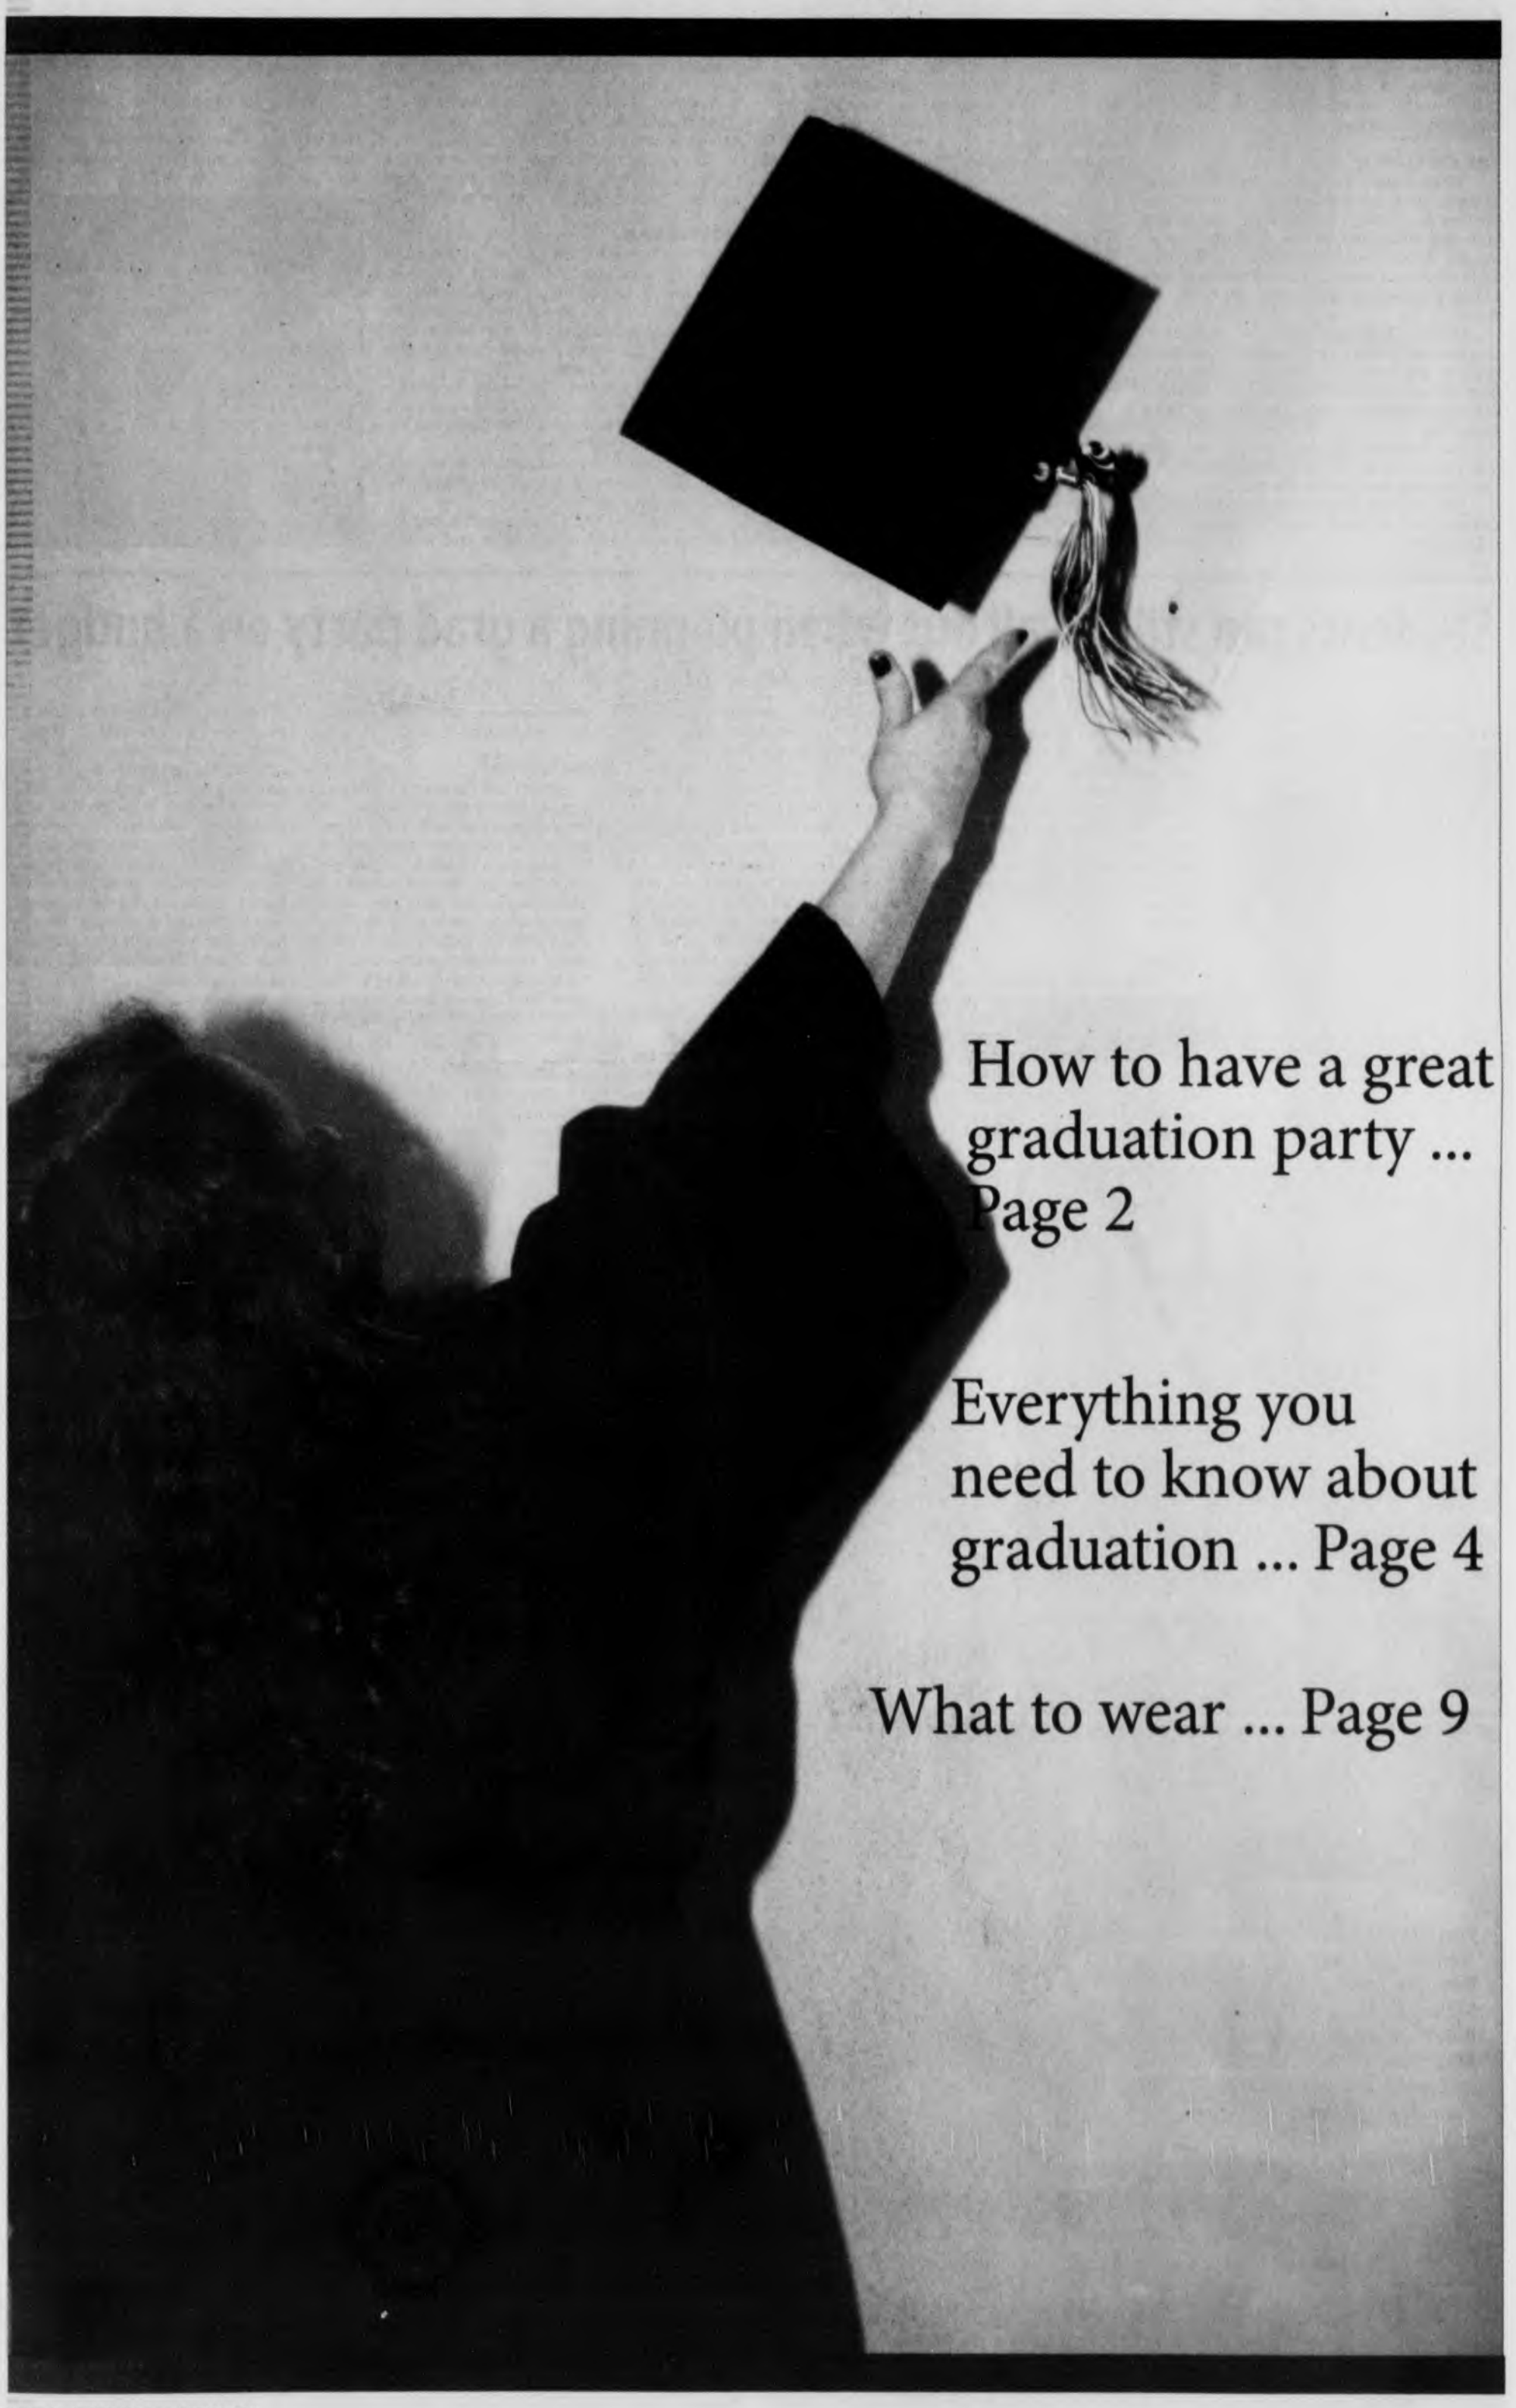
Minnie Driver still isn't revealing who the father of her unborn child is, but she is saying who he isn't.

"Craig's not the dad," "The Riches" star told the UK's Independent newspaper, referring to San Francisco musician Craig Zolezzi, who many had suspected fathered the child she is carrying.

"He's my great friend and he's been so cool about it," Driver said of her pal. "I want to shield the baby's dad as much as I can because it wasn't his choice to get roped into all this stuff. It'll come out in time and there'll be some other bump people will be interested in and I'll have this baby and get on with my life."

Driver did however drop hints over who spawned the seed for impending arrival: He is English and "sort of in the same business," she said.

One reason he hasn't been identified is because "He's really busy like me," Driver said.



While the public tries to figure out Driver's baby-daddy, the actress, herself, will be sorting out more important issues – like where to produce the little one.

"A big part of me wants my child to be English," she said when asked where she wants to give birth. "My family are here and I'm sure I'll move back here one day. It's just that my work, and the opportunities I've had, have been so varied and wonderful in the States that I've just followed my nose really. There's an ease living in America, and you're judged far more harshly in Britain for your artistic endeavors. But, obviously politically, in America, it's a ... bloody mess."

Graduates need to plan ahead for living, traveling when moving out of state

By Katie Starzec
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Moving out of state after graduation can be a complicated process. Getting the job, transporting furniture, finding a place to live and simply adjusting to new surroundings are all part of the vicious – and hopefully exciting post-graduation cycle. Careful planning and helpful insight, can ease starting the post-graduation chapter of life.

THE JOB SEARCH

When looking for a career in another part of the country, graduates should consider how far they are willing to move and what kind of area they would like to live in. Bestplacestolive.com directs searchers to Web sites that estimate salaries in cities across the nation as well as help people chose what city might be best for them.

Cynthia Hoffman, senior in agricultural communications and journalism, said she is thankful the faculty in her department offers help with post-college planning like evaluation of benefits packages, moving options and living arrangements.

For students who need advice with jobs and relocation, Career and Employment Services can help unscramble the puzzle.

"We certainly welcome students to come in and meet with our staff," said CES director Kerri Day Keller.

She said CES's staff offers information to students who are looking at opportunities out of state. CES also offers a yearly workshop for students who plan to relocate for their career.

For soon-to-be graduates who have already accepted a job, deciding where to live might not be such an important issue, but some planning still needs to be done.

Hoffman said she recently accepted a job in California. She said she recommends visiting the area you might be living in, even before accepting a job offer; if the area's price of living is exceptionally high, salary could be negotiated to accommodate the extra costs.

To help with moving expenses, ask your employer for a relocation fee. Hoffman said she is receiving money and extra funds to help her move and get situated.

"The relocation fee plus the extra cushion ... helped take off some of the stress," she said.

With the money, she said she will be able to afford whatever apartment options are available.

FINDING A PLACE TO LIVE

Hoffman said she started looking at apartments in the California area right away, before she accepted the job.

"The sooner you get a place to live, the sooner you can get transitioned," she said.

Be sure to ask a landlord about an apartment or house's down payment, cost per month, utility costs, on-site laundry facilities and pools. Graduates should also ask if the apartment has large kitchen utilities like a refrigerator, stove or dishwasher and if the landlord does background checks on all the residents.

In California, Hoffman said there are month-by-month leases instead of typical yearly leases here in Manhattan. This could make it harder, or easier, to find a place. Also, the complexes Hoffman contacted require a face-to-face visit when receiving the down payment – you should find out if this is the case in your new state. It might require an extra trip.

It's a good idea to get acquainted with the area, too, Hoffman said. Visit the grocery store and find the nearest park or movie theater.

MOVING STUFF

There are several ways to get furniture and belongings from point A to point B – fly them there, rent a moving van, have someone follow you with a truck or sell your big furniture and buy some when you are settled in your new home. Find out if there's a used furniture store in your new city or town.

The moving industry has many options for movers like U-hauls, specialty boxes and movable storage units. If you're not going too far, this might be a good investment.

If the distance is considerable, as in Hoffman's case, selling your large furniture might be the cheaper option.

"If I have to sleep on a sleeping bag for a couple weeks, I'll be OK," she said with a laugh.

Also, if you're moving a great distance, a new car might be a wise investment. Hoffman said she was afraid her old Buick might not survive the journey, so she's currently in the market for a newer car. She said she decided to drive to her new state because after weighing her options, she found it to be the least expensive option.

Moving out of state after college is different than moving to a new state to go to college, Hoffman said. Once you move into the professional world, you might not have peers close by who can relate to your situation.

MOVING OUT OF STATE AFTER GRADUATION?

- Look at cost of living
- Find an apartment or home that fits your needs
- Visit the area before moving to ease your transition
- Ask for a relocation fee from employer
- Allow time to get settled before day one
- Find rules about lease dates
- Research the state's laws
- Decide how you will be moving your belongings
- Decide how you will travel to your new home
- Consider what new things you'll have to buy

Students can still go all out when planning a grad party on a budget

ALEX PEAK

As if sending out announcements, scoring a cap and gown and sobering up enough to walk across the stage when they call your name isn't enough, graduates also need to plan some sort of graduation party or get-together.

Nowhere in the rulebook does it say you must have a post-graduation party for everyone on your block and your very extended family, but at the very least, you should invite close friends and family members.

Here are some tips to help ease the party-planning process:

DRINKS

Since you should be inviting family members as well as friends, your guest age-range has the potential to be pretty diverse. Offer more than just Coors Light by having some punch (Sprite mixed with Hawaiian Punch and orange/lime/raspberry sorbet work wonders), soft drinks and bottled water. Save the hard liquor for after your family leaves.

FOOD

Most college students don't have an expendable budget that allows for fancy catering. Stick to what you know best. Plan your food around the time you graduate. For example, with the School of Arts & Sciences the ceremony is at the crack of dawn. Your guests might enjoy a brunch or light lunch. For afternoon or evening graduations, you can choose dinner or lunch-type foods. Grill, barbecue or go sandwich style with small butter rolls, ham, turkey, roast beef and cheese. Swing by the grocery store to pick up a fruit and vegetable tray, and grab some chips and dip while you're there. Whatever you do, don't forget the cake. Special order, pick one up from Wal-Mart or mix one up yourself. Cake is an essential to any celebratory gathering. The "congrats" skated across in icing reminds people of just how important you are.

DECORATIONS

The dumber, the cheaper, the tackier, the better when it comes to graduation decorations – go all out. What other event will you be able to use all of those "2008 Graduate" plates, napkins, tablecloths, streamers, lawn art for?

INVITATIONS

Don't feel the need to formalize your post-grad party invitations. Slipping an extra sliver of paper in with the announcement with the time, date, location, etc., details will do just fine. Be sure to send an invitation out with all of your announcements – even to those relatives who live halfway across the planet and show no signs of making an appearance. You'll be all the more likely to receive a handsome gift or check in the mail if you make an effort to include everyone.

MONEY SAVERS

Though most college grads might have already snagged jobs, most of us haven't received paychecks yet. If you need to follow a strict budget, try co-hosting your party with roommates or friends who are also graduates to help cut down on costs. Why not share the celebration with other peoples' family members? The more the merrier.

Just be sure to keep this in mind: Though you will only (probably) graduate once in 2008, you will have your friends and family members for the rest of your life. Be a happy, but honorable grad and be sure to send thank-you letters for all of your new loot.

K-State alumni share what they've been doing since graduation

By Christine Caplinger
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

After college many graduates try to figure out what to do with their lives. These K-State graduates tell us where they are now after spending their days in Manhattan.

LACEY MACKEY
Class of '07 undergraduate journalism and mass communications and art

What have you been doing since graduation?

I stayed in Kansas after graduation and spent the summer working and interning at a magazine in Wichita. After that, I packed all of my worldly belongings in my cruiser and moved to Washington, D.C., where my parents relocated to about three years ago. I worked for a few months at a bookstore but felt the urge to do something new and different. I really wanted to go to Africa after doing a story about a friend of mine who went last summer.

So, I decided to go. I'm actually just working as a volunteer right now at an international school (Heritage International School in Africa). I work in the office here as well as helping in a few classrooms and working in children's ministries with the mission organization I'm with, which is World Gospel Mission. I haven't decided on a job or a career – I'm working here until the middle of June.

What do you miss most about K-State?

I miss my friends, of course. I also miss little things – working late nights at the Collegian, spending all day in Kedzie Hall, going to the Cat's Den for "Happy Hour" cokes, sitting in the Union during breaks to study, roaming around the library and enjoying the beauty of the campus.

SARAH BOUKER
Class of '06
masters in public administration

What did you decided to do after you graduated from K-State?

After I graduated I moved to Washington, D.C. to begin my career with the Federal government. I have been working for the Department of Homeland Security for almost two years now. While working for DHS, I did a six month detail to the State Department where I worked on peacekeeping issues.

How was post-graduation different for you than college?

During graduate school, I was one of those people who studied all of the time. If I wasn't studying or working on a paper, I felt guilty. While I certainly took time to hang out with friends, go to KSU games, and take the occasional road trip, most of my time was spent working at one of my two jobs, doing homework, or going to school. Now, while work is busy, my evenings and weekends are my own. It's a nice change.

Is there anything you wish you would have done in college?

I wish I would have gone home more often. Unfortunately now that I live on the East Coast it is hard to get back home to Hays, Kan.

The nearest major airport is Kansas City, Mo., and then it is a five hour drive back home which makes it difficult.

What advice do you have for students preparing to graduate?

My advice to those graduating would be to take chances when applying for new jobs or moving to a new location. I remember the time around my graduation being somewhat nerve-wracking with all of the big decisions I had to make. My dad gave me great advice though. He told me that this was the time to take chances, make big changes, and try something new. If you try something and fail or fall flat on your face, he said, you are young and can pick yourself up and start over again. Once you are older, there is less room for these types of errors. You will have a family, a job, a home, etc and can't take as big of risks. Those graduating should think of this as an exciting time and one that leaves room for exploring possibilities and taking big chances.

NICK ZIMMERMAN
Class of O7' undergraduate in information sciences

What have you been doing since graduation?

I graduated in December with a BS in Information Systems and moved to Wichita, where I work full-time for Koch Industries as a server administrator for their IT organization. I have joined Young Professionals of Wichita (YPW), and I also still do volunteer work with Kansas HOBY, a youth leadership program for high-school sophomores.

How has post graduation been different from college for you?

The biggest change has been adjusting to an 8-to-5 work day. I really liked having a varied schedule while at K-State, so I miss having some mornings or afternoons free during the week.

How did you decide what you wanted to do with your career?

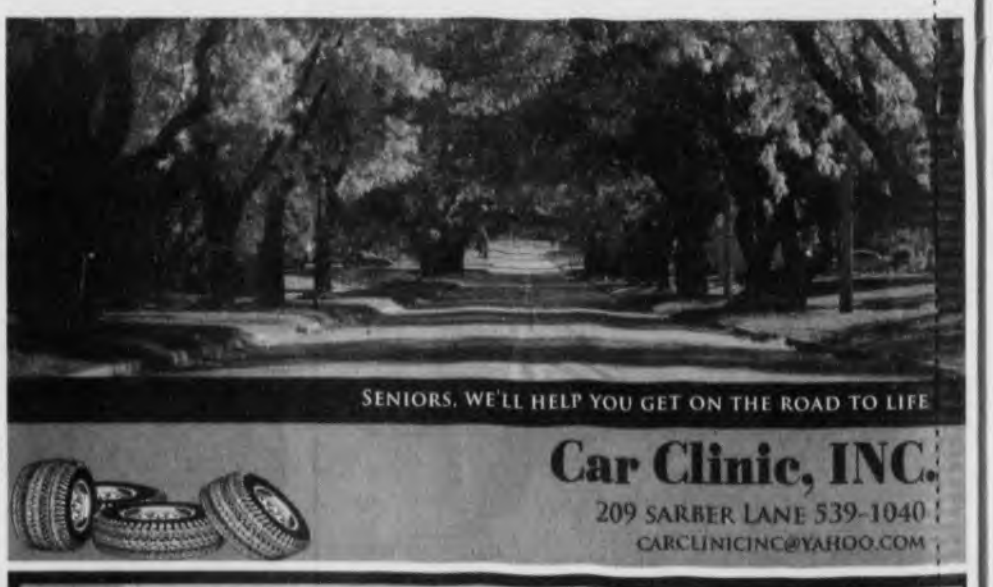
For me, internships were a big help in finding a full-time job. I spent four summers in internships, and the last two were with Koch Industries.

There, I found a group and work that I enjoyed, and I liked my fit with the company's culture, too. It made it easy to be excited about moving from an internship to a full-time role with them.

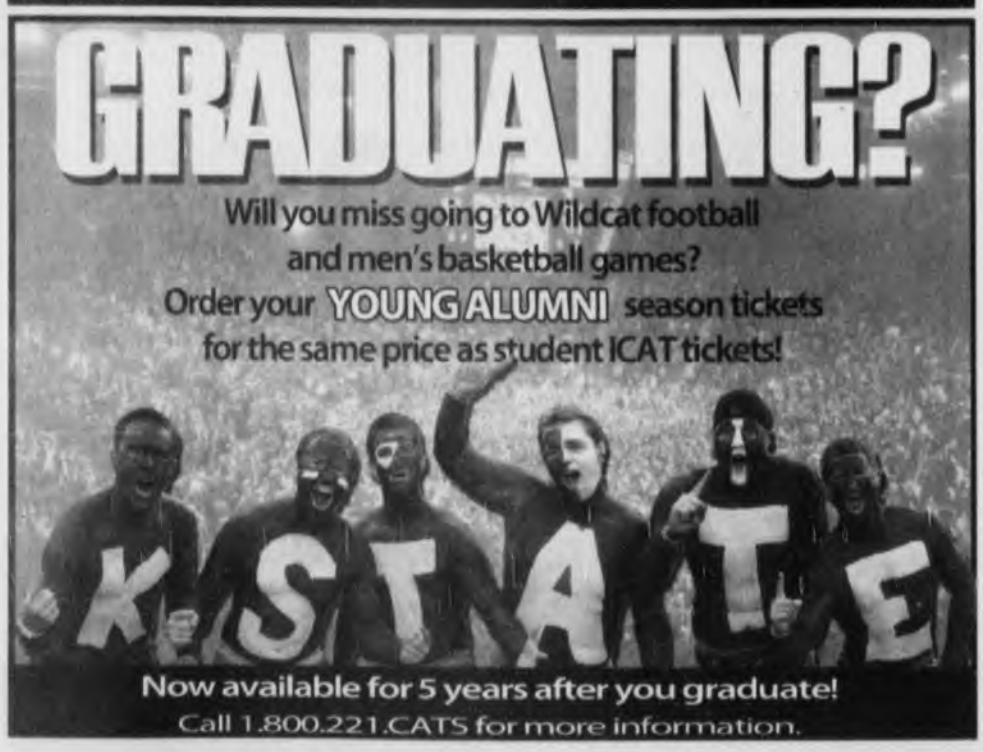
What advice can you give to graduates?

Take advantage of the time you have left.

I think we take for granted the opportunities we have while being a college student.



If there's an activity, organization, or personal goal you always wanted to achieve, make it a priority! Your opportunities after college aren't going to be nearly as plentiful or available.



Also, don't forget to pack your networking skills when you leave college–they become all the more valuable! Wherever you are, look for ways to get involved in organizations in the community as well.

What part of KSU do you miss the most?

For me, what I miss the most is the reason most of us chose to come to K-State in the first place–the people and the atmosphere.

A SENIOR REMEMBERS

College serves as a time for personal growth, educational opportunities

ADRIANNE DEWEESE

This column has served as a work-in-progress in my mind for the last three years.

I can remember my first semester at the Kansas State Collegian in spring 2005 like the days were – as cliché as it sounds – yesterday. I looked up to the seniors and considered them mentors – and I can remember reading their "exit columns."

This is it.

Despite four years of preparation and experiences, I seem almost at a loss for words in what to write, because I cannot believe that my academic career is almost over. Though I plan to attend graduate school in several years, I know that the experience will never compare with the last four years.

Let me dispel two college myths for readers with two stories about my K-State experiences.

As a child, I loved reading and often practiced flash cards and worked extra problems in workbooks for fun – in fact, one of my favorite "toys" during first grade were my presidential flash cards. I love school, and I love learning. When I had problems or worries in middle school and high school, I'd flash forward and think of college.

My senior year of high school, in May 2004, I had to prepare a PowerPoint in a computer class about myself and my post-graduation plans. Among those plans was to attend K-State and go "pot luck" with my roommate in the residence halls.

In August 2007, I received a letter one day that finally told me who my roommates were. When I went to e-mail them, one of them had already e-mailed me. She was just as anxious and excited to meet me.

My first glimpse of Jackie Hand was the night I moved into our residence-hall room. Because she was on K-State's Color Guard, Jackie had already moved in because she had band camp. I attended a small parade in Aggieville that evening and watched my future best friend perform with the Color Guard.

Every now and then, we meet people who will be friends. They might be friends for several semesters or even several years, but then we lose contact with them as our lives separate. In fall 2004, I got lucky. I met one of my soul mates.

I've heard horror stories of those who didn't get along well with their residence-hall roommates; I made a lifelong friend who continues to support me even though we're no longer roommates.

Lastly, I'd like to do a little cheerleading, if you will, for K-State. Both of my parents attended K-State in the early 1970s, and I basically knew my entire childhood and adolescence that I, too, would attend K-State.

Growing up in Wamego, which is 15 miles down the highway, I attended class field trips at K-State. I listened to upperclassmen say "Oh, I'll probably just go to K-State," like they were settling on a university.

Though K-State was a constant staple in my youth – after all, I took swimming lessons at the Natatorium – my first days at K-State were nothing like previous experiences. And, I didn't settle.

This university has presented me with academic and journalistic opportunities that I never dreamt of. Though I've also experienced my share of heartbreaks during the last four years, I honestly wouldn't change a single aspect of my collegiate career.

If I could offer one piece of advice from these two stories, it would be this: make college your own experience. Toss aside the myths and rumors you've heard about college or K-State. Each day is a fresh start, and no one can change those days but yourself.

Adrianne DeWeese will graduate (fingers crossed) cum laude on May 17 in print journalism and criminology. DeWeese plans to move to the Kansas City area and (fingers crossed) land a writing job, but she will miss her days in Kedzie Hall. Please send comments to opinion@spub.ksu.edu.

Ceremonies grow throughout centuries to accommodate classes, guests

By Elise Podhajsky
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

As hard as it might be to believe, graduation is just around the corner, and with it, for many students comes the commencement spectacle. By now, K-State students have gotten used to the fact that this university's graduation ceremonies are large enough to be in Bramlage Coliseum and consist of an address, a few guest speakers and diploma presentation. However, more than 100 years ago, the ceremonies took place in a small church for graduating classes and each graduating senior took a turn giving a speech.

Eventually, graduating classes grew and so did the number of guests, consequently, so much that children under the age of 12 were prohibited from attending for spatial reasons.

The following excerpts are from the Industrialist – the school's primary news source before the Collegian – and tell the stories of graduates from two century's past and of a rapidly growing university.

MAY 20, 1876
INDUSTRIALIST

The Commencement exercises in town were held at the Presbyterian church, commencing on Sabbath evening with the Baccalaureate sermon by President Anderson. We regret our space will not admit of an extended report of a discourse so earnest and impressive. The subject, "Hope," was very appropriate to the young graduates, who go from this school into the larger school of the world with the bright expectation of obtaining all that is desirable therein. Not only the graduates but the crowded house listened with close attention to the thoughts which showed in what consisted the true hope in this life and in the life to come, and what were the hopes not well grounded. The music was truly excellent and as usually under the direction of Prof. Platt, and consisted of a double quartette with Mrs. Werden at the organ, assisted by the orchestra under the direction of 'Squire Tyrrell.

... The roses and pansies hurried their time of blossoming for this occasion and at the close of each address a beautiful bouquet of flowers was thrown at the feet of the speaker.

JUNE 11, 1887
INDUSTRIALIST

A few minutes before ten o' clock Wednesday morning the Chapel doors were thrown open and the visiting hundreds poured eagerly in and filled the seats. Promptly at ten the class of '87, twenty one in number, filed in, followed by the candidates for the second degree, the Faculty, and the Regents, in the order named. The orchestra played the overture "Fidelio," by Beethoven, following which Rev. Mr. Rankin, of St. Paul's Episcopal church, offered prayer. The class oration then followed, and with short intermissions for music, occupied the time until almost two o' clock. The orations were limited to five minutes, and were necessarily lacking in that elaborateness so much desired by every public speaker ... Prof. Olin has carried the whole burden of drilling the class. Only his sharp and careful pruning could bring twenty-one orations within in the limits of four minutes each and yet preserve enough of the connected line of thought to enable the author to present his ideas clearly.

JUNE 26, 1900
INDUSTRIALIST

The program of Commencement day consisted of a drill and basket ball game, at 8:30 a.m., on the campus, but the class in Calisthenics, the annual address, at 10 a.m., by Hon. James Wilson, Secretary of Agriculture, the presentation of diplomas, a band concert by the Cadet band in uniform, at 2 p.m., a military drill by the College of battalion at 2:45, the annual meeting of the alumni, and an evening reception in Agricultural Hall in honor of Hon. James Wilson, tendered by President and Mrs. Nichols. To report all of these items, and the address in detail would be greatly overtax to pages of the Industrialist – all that we can do it to give short excerpts from the papers for Manhattan and the State, who have reported our festivities. The weather was favorable – Commencement day was the most prefect day of the most beautiful month of the Kansas year, and the visiting friends and patrons of the College formed an immense throng from building to building, all over the campus. It was estimated that fully 5,000 people were present on the grounds at 4 o'clock in the afternoon – the greatest audience by far that had ever assembled at any exercise of the Kansas State Agricultural College.

What to wear

On long graduation day, comfort is key

ELISE PODHAJSKY

Living in a house full of graduating girls, I've been hearing many of the same sort of questions lately, like "What should I wear to graduation?"

Though the thought for many women, and some men, educes stress, the answer is simple, really – wear whatever you want.

Now, before I go on, take another look at that last sentence. Yes, you should wear whatever you want, but that means you actually have to wear something. This is a warning for all the class clowns out there. Sure, it might have been funny in high school to go au naturale under your cap and gown, but come on. You're graduating from college and expected to dive into the "real" or "adult" world. That old prank is not a very classy or respectable way to make your first splash.

So like I said, wear whatever you want. The reason for this is comfort. You're probably going to be sitting in Bramlage for longer than you would like, anxiously anticipating your alumni status and half-listening to the various speakers for your colleges. The last issues you should be worried or thinking about are wedgies, stifling collars and constricting shoes.

DRESSY

If your family and friends are coming to visit and want to take you out to Four Olives Wine Bar or Harry's before or after the ceremony, T-shirts and jeans are probably not the way to go. However, you can still be comfortable and meet the dress codes at the same time.

Guys – go for a soft polo or button-up and a nice pair of slacks or khakis. Suits are most likely a no-go, and you'll probably want to leave out the neck tie, though if you get emotional, it might be a good excuse to tell the person next to you why you're getting so "choked up." Dress how you would for a night out when you want to impress the ladies – or gentlemen.

Girls – cocktail and formal dresses are probably a little much for this occasion. Downgrade to a comfy knee-length skirt and loose blouse or, if you want to stay with the dress, a cute cotton or linen sundress. Though some women are completely relaxed in a pair of pumps, I suggest opting for a kitten heel or a pair of flats – they're easy to get around in and won't squish your toes while you're waiting for your name or college to be called.

CASUAL

If you and your buddies or girlfriends are just planning on tapping a keg or heading to Aggieville after commencement, there is no real need to dress up. What you're wearing will be hidden by your gown anyway, so why not go for a T-shirt and a pair of shorts? You'll stay cool and comfortable throughout the ceremonies and be ready to celebrate the moment you're out the door. Just make sure you actually wear something.

Mass communications seniors share their farewells

WENDY HAUN

After thinking long and hard about what wisdom I wanted to impart to the rest of the classes at K-State, I realized I have to go with what I'm most passionate about: Sports. I am the sports editor, after all.

My advice is to keep supporting K-State athletics. Whether you go to the football games, basketball games, decide to take in an occasional volleyball match or cheer on the rowing team at Tuttle Creek Reservoir, keep supporting the Wildcats in all their athletic endeavors. Be proud. Be purple. Go K-State.

CHRISTINA FORSBERG

I got in here freshman year and never left. Now, I've done just about every job in the newsroom, so I suppose there's nothing left to do but graduate.

To my readers: thanks for reading and critiquing my work I still haven't changed my opinions.

To the viewers of my design and line art: thanks for all the compliments and support.

To the kid who commented in the Fourum that my column and accompanying line art was horrible for my first time as a columnist my sophomore year: Yeah, I remember you thanks a lot.

And finally to my coworkers: thanks for your advice, humor, and insanity you've given me some colorful memories. After graduation, I'll be heading to Washington, D.C., this summer for an internship with the Charles G. Koch Charitable Foundation followed by graduate school in economics at George Mason University in the fall. Stay classy, K-State.

NICOLE JOHNSTON

I'M DONE! It was only four years ago when I began my college career, and I feel like it went by so fast – but I'm not going to miss it. Many of my hours went to slaving away at the Collegian. As an intimidated sophomore, I walked into the newsroom for the first time and started one of the best opportunities available. Throughout my Collegian career, I've tried everything I can get my hands on, learned about all the aspects of producing a daily paper and had 1,000 new experiences. Working at the Collegian not only helped my résumé, it helped build part of my character. If I can offer any advice at all, it would be to find your newsroom. Find a job or an organization that challenges you and that you can learn from every day. You'll quickly see that these opportunities become an extremely valuable part of your college experience. As for me, I'm kissing Kansas goodbye and starting my fabulous journey as a journalist. SEE YA!

KRISTIN HODGES

Though I started as an open-option major, I finally found my home in Kedzie my sophomore year when I started at the Collegian. It has provided the best practical experience college could give me, and we had a lot of fun in the newsroom along the way. I will never forget panicking over deadlines, eating at Panda Express one too many times and trying to pose for a photo under water. But really, I'm grateful for the friendships I have made during my years with the paper. After graduation, I will be an intern in Washington, D.C., for the summer, and after that, who knows ...

ADRIANNE DEWEESE

I woke up one morning in February 2005 with a spontaneous goal – I wanted to write for the Kansas State Collegian.

Though I was a life-long English nerd who loved reading and writing, I had no high-school journalism experience. Writing and reporting for a newspaper also is a completely different experience than writing a five-page research paper for Expository Writing 101.

My first stories were horrible, as can be expected, but I was determined. I spent every free moment in Kedzie 116, soaking up as much of the newsroom atmosphere as possible. I remember researching and interviewing sources for two weeks before my first lead package ran.

After three years, two editorial positions and about 500 articles to my name, I can honestly say that I love Kedzie Hall. By the time this column goes to print, I will have signed my name on the newsroom ceiling, along with former White House press secretary and K-State alumnus Marlin Fitzwater, Washington Post reporter Bob Woodward, The New York Times publisher Arthur Sulzberger Jr. and former head football coach Bill Snyder.

For the sake of ink space, I will not discuss my long-term career aspirations. However, I plan to relocate to the greater Kansas City area this summer and pursue a writing career. Regardless of my future, though, I'll never forget my 19-year-old scared self who started out as a clueless, aspiring journalist. For current and aspiring reporters, I leave you this simple piece of advice: If you're not getting answers, ask better questions.

BRETT KING

My wonderful experience with the Collegian began after being "asked" to leave The Wildcat 91.9 FM. The opinion editor at the time needed a writer for the staff. I started writing, and that is how it all got started. What I will miss after leaving the Collegian will be the late nights, the scotch and cigars I would enjoy while writing. To the readers who enjoyed my work, I'm glad to have your support and keep fighting the good fight. Those who hated my writing, thank you for all the hate mail; it gave me a good, hearty laugh. After graduation, I will not being using my political science degree or my minors. I will be teaching at Rockhurst High School in Kansas City, Mo. When I am done teaching, I am leaning towards going to culinary school and opening a restaurant.

Jonathan Knight | COLLEGIAN

ALEX PEAK

I started in open option and avoided picking a major until the last minute. I began my tenure at the Collegian when I was a sophomore, and I still remember almost peeing my pants during an interview for my first story. Who starts a new reporter out with a story about the death penalty, anyway? Somehow, I worked my way up from one semester as a nervous reporter to Edge, campus, news and Edge (again) editors and editor-in-chief. Just like avoiding having to pick a major, I also tried to steer clear of graduating, so I decided to stick around for an extra year to get another degree. After graduation, with my two degrees print journalism and advertising, minor in French and secondary major in international studies in tow, I will be working at Ketchum Directory Advertising in Overland Park, Kan.

TORNADO AFTERMATH

Blown away

Matt Binter | COLLEGIAN

The Sigma Alpha Epsilon fraternity house was one of the most damaged buildings, losing a large portion of its roof. The house is located on the corner of Denison Avenue and College Heights Road.

K-Staters affected by E-F4 tornado that swept through campus

By Salena Strate
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Damaged campus buildings and facilities transformed from shattered to fixed following the June 11 tornado that touched down on the K-State campus. President Jon Wefald said all buildings and facilities should be restored to working order by Aug. 15. The tornado caused $22 million in damage on campus.

"Our immediate goal is to make repairs that will keep our buildings dry in case of rain," said Bruce Shubert, associate vice president for administration and finance. "Another priority is removing storm debris so pedestrians and traffic can safely move around campus."

Facilities personnel blocked traffic at several campus entrances Thursday and Friday so work could be done. Classes were canceled on Thursday and started again on Friday. Due to the severe damage to some buildings, 18 classes had to be reassigned to temporary locations. Students were notified by a university-wide e-mail and the information was posted on the K-State Web site.

"We will endeavor to return all classes to their originally assigned locations as soon as possible, and we will reassess the situation on Monday to ascertain which classrooms now under repair have been made safe and ready for classes to return to them," said Duane Nellis, provost and senior vice president.

Campus buildings that received the most amount of damage include: Weber Hall, Waters Hall, Durland Hall, Rathbone Hall, Fiedler Hall, Call Hall, Cardwell Hall and Ward Hall.

Ward Hall, which is home to K-State's nuclear reactor, remained secure, said Mo Hosni, head of K-State's department of mechanical and nuclear engineering.

"The K-State reactor manager reported the tornado damage to the building to the Nuclear Regulatory Commission about 12:30 a.m., Thursday," Hosni said.

Hosni said officials were pleased with how the reactor weathered.

The USDA-ARS Wind Erosion Research Unit sustained severe damage but remained intact and operational. Located directly next to the wind erosion lab is a parking/equipment garage that was completely destroyed. John Tatarko, soil scientist at the wind erosion lab, said the loss of research was minimal.

"We have already progressed significantly on the cleanup of the damage and hope to continue our focus on research," Tatarko said.

Safety concerns also arose when news of the Sigma Alpha Epsilon fraternity house reported its roof had been blown off. No fraternity members were injured during the storm. City crews worked all day Thursday lifting the roof off of Denison Street.

"Charlie Hostetler, SAE adviser said the SAE house will be back up and running this fall," said Pat Bosco, associate vice president and dean of student life.

The summer's wild weather is not isolated to the state of Kansas. University campuses in Iowa and Illinois are now facing high floodwaters, and Gov. Kathleen Sebelius said this year, 175 tornados have touched down around our state.

Following the storm, many local and surrounding-area volunteers have donated their time to help with the Manhattan and campus cleanup. When students do come back to school in the fall, the campus facilities and campus buildings should be fully restored.

Nathaniel LaRue | COLLEGIAN

Jim Jones of Ogden, Kan., surveys the destruction in the Miller Ranch area of Manhattan Thursday afternoon. The area around Amherst Avenue was among the most widely damaged in Manhattan by the tornado on Wednesday night.

ROAD CLOSINGS

The City of Manhattan will close sections of Amherst Avenue today for the removal of large trees and as a safety precaution. From 6:30 a.m. to 8 a.m. Amherst will be closed from Seth Childs Road to Research Avenue and from 8 a.m. to noon Amherst Avenue will be closed from Research Avenue to North Darthmouth Drive. Please detour to Miller Parkway and K-18 to enter and exit these neighborhoods.

Summer cricket matches underway

By Allie Schmidt
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Indian Students Association's cricket tournament is already underway for the 2008 summer season.

The preliminary and first rounds have been played, however, Friday starts the quarterfinals and continues with the semi-finals on Saturday. The finals will be this Sunday, said Vishal Bhabia, ISA member and graduate student in computer science. All games will be played at Memorial Stadium.

The first games will start between 6:30 and 7:00 p.m. The last game will end about 10:30 p.m., said Samuel Benny Kummary, ISA president and graduate student in computer science. In case of bad weather, canceled games will be Friday, June 27-Sunday, June 29, Kummary said.

This is the second year for the summer cricket tournament, Kummary said.

He also said the tournament is open to anyone who would like to participate, but registration for this summer is already closed, but students are encouraged to come and watch. Kummary said there are other students who play in the tournament besides just ISA members.

Bhabia said that students should come and watch because it is an entertaining game and though it has some different rules, it is similar to baseball.

"Cricket also gives others a look at what [Indian students] do in their free time," he said.

Cricket is the most popular game in India, Bhabia said. The tournament and the game itself gives everyone a chance to get together.

The tournament only occurs during the summer, but Bhabia said the ISA members try to play cricket when they can on weekends during the school year.

Residents see lootings

By Eric Davis
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

In the wake of the June 11 tornado, Riley County Police arrested one man on charges of looting. A warrant will be issued for the arrest of another man.

At 12:15 a.m., Thursday, a man was seen loading DeWalt tools into his vehicle, according to Lt. Kurt Moldrup of the RCPD.

The man had collected tools that had been blown out of the Water's True Value Hardware store that was destroyed by the tornado. Members of the community saw the man, confronted him and held him until police arrived to take him away.

"They took his keys from him and didn't let him leave," Moldrup said.

He also said the man was not physically detained, but a large number of people coerced him to wait for the police. The second report of looting came from an officer in plain clothes.

The officer saw a man pick up a 12-inch Mikata carbide blade and put it into his vehicle. Due to the tornado, police were needed elsewhere, and the man's information was obtained by the police; a warrant will be issued for his arrest.

Moldrup said with all found property, an attempt must be made to find the owner and if one is not made, the act is labeled as theft.

Student-run farm provides Manhattan, campus with organic produce

Varrell Unruh-Carey, junior in horticulture, harvests lettuce at the Willow Lake Student Farm last Wednesday. Unruh-Carey said his favorite part about working on the farm is selling the harvested crops at the farmer's market.

They appear to be a random mix of students, from a petite, pale-faced woman full of bubbly energy, to a lanky, quiet man whose intimidating, dark dreadlocks hang down past his shoulders. In any other setting, they might not have even known each other. But here, their passions for sustaining nature and growing organic produce have also sprouted a friendship.

Elena Pyzhov, senior in horticulture, and Varrell Unruh-Carey, junior in horticulture, are just two of the five student interns hired to work on the K-State Willow Lake Student Farm throughout the summer, gaining hands-on experience in their fields of study. The farm is a 5-acre plot of land located next to Tuttle Creek Reservoir about five miles west of Manhattan, on which student interns organically grow more than 30 different vegetables, fruits and herbs to sell within the K-State and Manhattan communities.

A LEARNING EXPERIENCE

Pyzhov said she first heard about the farm from her professor, Rhonda Janke, the interns' adviser. Janke, also an associate professor of horticulture, forestry and recreation, said she encourages her students to get involved in the farm.

"It's a chance to get some first-hand experience and see how what you learn in the classroom can be used in real life," she said. "I try to mention it to all my students. They need this experience."

Mike Magelli, intern at the farm and senior in greenhouse operations, said it's the hands-on experience that will not only boost his résumé, but also his income.

"The pay is nice; we make $10 an hour," he said. "I'm so lucky to get paid for what I love to do, and I'll probably be doing something like this, hopefully, for the rest of my life."

Magelli also said he enjoys working in the garden when he wants to get away from the busyness of Manhattan.

"Out here it's so calm; it's nice to escape for a while and dig your hands in the dirt," he said.

ORGANICALLY GROWN

Because the farm is organic – meaning the produce is grown without the use of conventional pesticides and fertilizers – farm manager Jenny Guilford said they use much more natural methods of ridding the plants of bugs. Guilford, also a senior in horticulture, said they have had problems lately with lepedoptran worms – fat, grub-like pests – eating holes in the cabbage plants and other plants. She said they spray the affected plants once a week with Bt (Bacillus thuringiensis), an organically approved bacterium that is found naturally in the soil.

Janke said this is the perf-ect time of year for harvesting

Real media

Journalists save lives in wake of storm, public should understand ambitions

Christina Klein | COLLEGIAN

CHRIS SWICK

The simple fact is there are times when journalists can be, well, a bit over the top, creating sensational stories not even worth the time it takes to read them.

It seems like the journalists seen on TV are more concerned with finding out the effects of getting tasered or how Lindsey Lohan is doing in rehab.

I work at Manhattan Broadcasting as a disc jockey on four stations, and when asked where I work, I usually tell people, but I have never really flown my colors. When I'm out in Aggieville, I would prefer not to be Swick from Z96.3, or Chris from KROCK.

Oftentimes, I even find myself to be slightly embarrassed by what I do. I've worked at places where the quality was a little lacking.

The problem is society's reception to modern media. With outlets like Perez Hilton's blogs, ultra-biased news channels, and overall-sensationalizing journalists, it can be difficult for people to trust and enjoy today's media. Until a week ago, I was one of those people.

That, however, changed last Wednesday night. When the tornado tore into town, I was working as a board operator at 1350 KMAN – I realized that without media, our world would be lost. The effort of many journalists and radio personalities during the 12-straight hours of coverage during that crazy night – and the corresponding community response – have reminded me of why I love this business, and why the rest of America should too.

The core existence of the media is to get information to the public that could potentially be a matter of life or death, as it was last Wednesday night. Sure, some of us forget journalism-class etiquette and insert ourselves into the stories, but that is what makes people comfortable. It makes them feel like the media is on their side, not just striving to be as shocking as possible. (Cable news channels: I'm talking about you.)

However, the vast majority of us on the local markets try to deliver information to our public in an unbiased way. I do not hesitate to say that on Wednesday night, that reporting probably saved some lives.

Regardless of what form of media people were using, most were probably aware of what was happening and knew to take shelter from the impending storm. And even afterward, when the cleanup and recovery began, the media's role as information brokers was just as important.

"I offered to go out and help with the cleanup," said Aaron Leiker, program director for KMAN. "But [City Manager] Ron Fehr told me he had more use for me where I was."

He was sitting inside a radio station – again – saving lives.

The various forms of media was the sole outlet the city had to get vital information to the public. From volunteer meeting places to needed supplies to local shelters and even what to do with trash and debris, local and national media did what they could to tell people what they needed to know to get on with their lives.

Journalists did not do so for higher ratings or for air time, but because it was the right thing to do. This is our job and this is our home. That's not to say, however, that the media didn't help out in other ways.

Patricia Scott, a relief worker for the American Red Cross, was helping in a shelter in Abilene, Kan., for survivors of the Chapman, Kan., tornado and also spent time last year in Greensburg, Kan., – which was destroyed by an F5 tornado in May 2007 – where she said she had been offended by the actions of the media in trying to get into the shelter, including one reporter who had masqueraded as a survivor to try and weasel into the shelter.

"This time was different," Scott said. "The reporters from KAKE in Wichita did their live report and then, when it was over, helped out in the shelter. It completely changed my opinion on the media."

So often, as a media person, it is easy to forget why we do what we do. We complain about our jobs, bosses and the hours, just like everyone else.

It may not seem like it, especially in light of the efforts by media personnel during last Wednesday night's tornado and the days to follow, but we are human. When it gets down to it, I wouldn't be anywhere else, and the next time a disenfranchised, pushy reporter or another exposé on Britney Spears becomes too irritating to handle, just remember that real media is there for the people and can be just as important as law enforcement, emergency crews and city officials.

Citizens should unite under common needs rather than issues that divide the country

JESSICA HENSLEY

Over the next few months, hundreds of polls will be conducted across the U.S. in an attempt to predict the outcome of the general political election. These polls will range in topic from gay rights to abortion to gun control to taxes to the Ten Commandments. However, it doesn't matter what the topic is, as all of these polls will inevitably prove one point: Americans disagree on everything. Not only do we disagree – we disagree vehemently.

In a Gallup Poll conducted earlier this year, more than two-thirds of Americans report giving "quite a lot" of thought to the presidential election this year – the highest such number Gallup has ever recorded. It's comforting to know people are paying attention. Unfortunately, all of this focus on the election seems to go hand in hand with a focus on what divides us as a nation.

We hear fierce debate on talk shows, newscasts and even from the presidential candidates, on politically and socially divisive issues like abortion and gay rights. It is easy to believe that is what the election should be about, but such a belief is incorrect.

Though there are many issues on which Americans do not agree, there are a few – a very important few – on which we do. According to interviews with American citizens that were conducted during Democratic presidential candidate Barack Obama's past senatorial campaign, there are some beliefs that seem to hold true across the board of race, religion and class. For example: The belief that anyone who is willing to work should be able to find a job that pays a decent wage.

Or the belief that we should leave the next generation better off than the ones that came before. The desire to be safe from both criminals and terrorists. The desire for clean air and clean water. The desire to be able to spend time at home with family. These hopes that we will forever hold in common should define the election of a new president, not those issues that divide us.

In choosing our next president, we are choosing the next leader of our nation and the voice of our people. The whole nation must be behind a final decision on election night – not just the voters who check his name at the polls. It is important that we choose someone who is genuinely looking to help our country move forward and not just looking for another partisan political victory.

Social progress will not be made by one side forcing the other to bend to their political will (like in California, where the ban on same-sex marriage was lifted last month, according to the Washington Post). It will be made through discussion and compromise and remembering that there is much more that unites us than divides us.

It is only in focusing on reaching those goals we have in common – rather than focusing on those issues on which we will never agree – that we as a nation will be able to move forward.

TO THE POINT

Volunteer efforts noticed

The tornado that ripped through Manhattan destroyed homes and businesses, but the winds could not blow away was the hope and resiliency of the Manhattan community.

TO THE POINT is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

Mere hours after the winds died down last Wednesday night, members of the K-State Division of Facilities were on campus working to restore our beautiful campus.

Similarly, work crews all over the city were out in the wee hours cleaning up immediately after the storm swept through Manhattan.

Miller Ranch – arguably the hardest hit residential area in town – also received a lot of help from those in the community.

Members of the K-State football team also traveled to Miller Ranch to lend their time and muscle to the clean-up efforts.

Also, while there was looting in certain areas of town, only two reports were confirmed, said Lt. Kurt Moldrup of the Riley County Police Department.

Now that the dust has settled, Manhattanites, K-Staters and all those affected by the storms should be proud of their quiet strength and will to carry on and encourage those suffering around them.

New pizzeria brings taste of the big apple to Kansas' own little apple

By Salena Strate
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

From an authentic yellow taxicab smashed into the side of the wall to a hot brick oven, Manhattan's newest pizza place lives up to the slogan "where the big apple meets the little apple." AJ's NY Pizzeria, located on 301 Poyntz Avenue, opened Saturday.

After living in New York City, AJ's owner, Adam Peyton, moved back to Manhattan and said he was disappointed in the pizza selection.

"At AJ's, we hand toss our dough," Peyton said. "The dough is really the key ingredient because it is crispy and chewy. We only use the freshest ingredients."

First-time customer Julie Hobaugh said she works downtown and AJ's location is really convenient. Hobaugh said her slice of mushroom pizza was delicious and she liked the crisp crust.

"There are a lot of pizza restaurants in town, but this one is unique because they do pizza by the slice, and with Old Chicago across the street, I thought they would have a lot of competition, but I think they are going to do well," she said "The lunch buffet is just another option for people working downtown, and it's within walking distance."

Peyton said he did most of the remodeling of the pizzeria himself, but brought in a friend from Brooklyn to produce signature recipes. In 10 months, Peyton turned what used to be a Schlotzsky's deli into a thriving pizzeria. Pizza can be made to order for size or per slice. AJ's also offers several specialty pizzas.

"I actually worked with Tom Lehmann, who is a renowned pizza author and an expert in the industry," Peyton said. "He taught me how to take the New York recipes and make it work in Manhattan, Kan. Every ingredient we use is used in New York."

Peyton said one unique cooking style they use is to steam tomato peels off instead of using acid. This technique creates a smoother taste and decreases the risk of heartburn. He said AJ's is the only restaurant in Manhattan that uses this technique.

Along with fresh pizza, specialty salads and made-to-order salads can be found on the menu. Peyton said customers might create their salad from more than 50 toppings and 11 lettuces. In the future, Peyton said he wants to remodel the outside sitting area into a comfortable space for customers. The outdoor garden might create a space for lunch meetings and family celebrations. Other features of the restaurant are the shuffleboard table.

Manhattan resident Tara McConkey said she heard the food at AJ's was good and wanted to give the locally owned restaurant some business.

"This is the first New York-style pizza place in Manhattan," McConkey said. "I bought two pieces of pizza because I didn't know how big the slices were."

Matt Binter | COLLEGIAN

K-State summer enrollment begins on campus for new, transfer students

Erin Johnson, sophomore in pre-nursing and social work, talks with Luke Miller, junior transfer student in management about K-State during student orientation Tuesday afternoon.

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Students will be seeing some new faces around campus over the next couple weeks as summer enrollment for new and transfer students continues.

Pat Bosco, associate vice president for institutional advancement and dean of student life, said enrollment is the beginning of an exciting journey for new K-State students.

"Enrollment has become a cornerstone of the K-State experience," he said. "The K-State show has become bigger and more exciting, and the responses have been great so far."

Bosco said there have been approximately 300 students attending enrollment per day and that 225 people attended Wildcat Warm-up last week. He said enrollment has been very successful, even after a tornado hit K-State's campus last Wednesday night.

"It was definitely a 'K-State Moment,'" Bosco said. "Everyone involved did a tremendous job of helping to move everything from the Union to Bramlage."

Edgar Bustillos, an orientation leader and junior in finance, said summer enrollment is more than just meeting with an adviser – it is an all day event.

"The orientation leaders give out helpful hints for new students to be successful at K-State," he said. "There are booths set up to give out information about clubs and fraternities that new students can join."

Abby Newell, a transfer student from Kansas Wesleyan University, said she chose to transfer to K-State because both her parents went to K-State. She also has two older siblings enrolled here.

"I really like the atmosphere of the campus," Newell said. "Enrollment has gone well, and I have been given some good information."

Enrollment for new and transfer students will continue for the rest of June, and another Wildcat Warm-up will take place from June 18-20.

Orientation and enrollment is a chance for new students to experience K-State before taking a class to make sure they get off on the right foot Bosco said.

"The entire program is supported by the Academic and Student Life Community," he said. "We want to ensure that the students are prepared and are given the tools to be successful here at K-State."

Gov. Sebelius meets with local leaders to address storm damage, repairs

By Eric Davis
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

One day after an E-F4 tornado ripped through Manhattan, Gov. Kathleen Sebelius joined K-State President Jon Wefald and Manhattan city officials to discuss the damage and what was next for the campus and the community.

"K-State will do the assessment of their buildings; homeowners will deal with their insurance companies to make an assessment," Sebelius said during a press conference on June 12.

She went on to say that the state's main duty is debris removal but the appropriate state agencies would be brought in to give community members the tools they need to get on with their lives.

"In Kansas, the upside of storms ... is that the planning process really works," Sebelius said. "The local emergency managers step in first and call for assistance and eventually we will turn to the federal government."

Sebelius said she has talked to the directors of several federal agencies and that "they are aware of the storm."

The Miller Ranch residential area west of Seth Child Road was the hardest-hit location in Manhattan. With blocks of homes destroyed, volunteers poured into the area to offer help. K-State President Jon Wefald said volunteers were "coming out of the woodwork" to help their community.

Rep. Sydney Carlin, D-Manhattan, said the city is organizing teams of volunteers who will be sent to where they are needed most.

In addition to community members, the K-State football team made it out to help clean up.

"Ron Prince did that on his own," Wefald said. "I appreciate that our football players were out in force. Of course, they can carry a lot of material."

Sebelius said that despite the severity of the storm, there were no deaths or injuries reported in Riley County. Carlin said that looting was "nipped in the bud" and that only two reports of looting surfaced.

A state of emergency was not declared after the tornado because one was already in effect from storms in May. Sebelius explained that the state was still open and that Fort Riley, Manhattan and K-State will be moved into that classification.

The governor also commented on the quickly organized clean-up efforts and the will of the people affected by the storms.

"Kansans are amazing. These folks are resilient," Sebelius said.

TORNADO RANKINGS:

The EF system of ranking tornadoes used by forecasters and researchers is based on the amount and type of wind damage caused by the storms, beginning with an EF-0. The tornado that went through the K-State campus was given an EF-4 ranking.

EF-1 MODERATE DAMAGE

Wind 86 to 110 mph. Considerable roof damage. Winds can uproot trees and overturn single-wide mobile homes. Flagpoles bend.

EF-2 CONSIDERABLE DAMAGE

Wind 111 to 165 mph. Most single-wide mobile homes destroyed. Permanent homes can shift off foundation. Flagpoles collapse. Softwood trees debarked.

EF-3 SEVERE DAMAGE

Wing 136 to 165 mph. Hardwood trees debarked. All but small portions of houses destroyed.

EF-4 DEVASTATING DAMAGE

Wind 166 to 200 mph. Complete destruction of well-built residences, large sections of school buildings.

EF-5 INCREDIBLE DAMAGE

Wind above 200 mph. Significant deformation of mid- and high-rise buildings.

A different form of deforestation

AUBREE CASPER

Though not visible beyond a dense line of trees in the northeast part of campus, the condition of the K-State Challenge Course surprised me as I walked through it for the first time. However, the damage it sustained during last Wednesday's tornado was even more unexpected.

A path of 11 low elements – or challenges – and two clusters of high ropes courses was affected by many downed trees and transferred debris from campus. With a course monitor to guide me through the nearly unrecognizable course, we started through the entrance off of the Z parking lot. The high ropes course was relatively unaffected, but the farther in we walked, the more visible the damage became.

The first seriously damaged element of the course was the Log Jam. Three small trees had fallen on this low-lying section of the course, making it impossible to tell how participants would complete it or even what was what.

The most affected out of the challenges was the Blind Maze. Luckily for the workers who are continuing clean-up of the course, a tree with a five foot in diameter tree trunk had fallen perfectly between the 18 posts in the maze, so only one was slightly crooked. The tree had been completely uprooted and immediately off of the course's path were the roots, reaching nearly eight feet into the air.

While the full affect of such a forested area, mostly influenced by downed trees and broken limbs, was not as shocking, a closer look made the tufts of insulation, metal siding, drywall and glass shards made the true extent of the tornado's impact more evident.

We exited the course through the main entrance facing the Derby Complex, and the entire parking lot was a sea of debris. What looked to be parts of greenhouses and the damaged wind erosion lab littered the T lots northeast of campus.

I hope to go back to the Challenge Course once it is fully restored. My first experience there was not exactly ideal, but it was a further extension of the true power of a tornado and how it can so greatly affect a quiet and peaceful corner of campus.

Destructive tornado claimed lives

June 16, 1966,

COURTESY PHOTO

What may have been the nation's single most destructive tornado caused an estimated $100 million damage and took the lives of 17 persons in Manhattan, Topeka, Leavenworth and Jarbalo Wednesday, June 8.

Damage to K-State Housing complexes, Kansas Agricultural Experiment Station and the campus tentatively has been estimated as high as $8 million if no heavy rains are received before roof repairs are made.

Since the storm, a rapid week of clean-up, repair, temporary housing, meetings for university officials and securement of emergency funds has begun to attempt to restore the original facilities.

Both the Kansas Agricultural Experiment Station and Jardine Terrace, the married student housing complex, were the most severely damaged areas of the University.

Facilities of the turkey, poultry, swine, and sheep research complexes, agronomy research buildings and equipment and the animal husbandry, grain elevator and storage buildings were 75 to 100 percent destroyed by the storm.

In a preliminary survey, the cost of cleaning up the destroyed agricultural research facilities will equal the cost of replacement, university officials said.

Randolph Gingrich, physical plant administrator said that only those buildings that cannot be repaired or are dangerous to humans and livestock would be torn down. A representative of the state architect's office will determine if the buildings are to come down.

Estimated damage to Jardine Terrace may run as high as $3 million, but the figure will not be known until the insurance companies estimate the total damage, Thorton Edwards, the director of housing, said.

Damage was mostly loss of roofs and glass damage to the 24-building apartment complex. Local contractors met with university officials Friday. The repair work was divided among six local contractors who began work Sunday.

Contractors are expected to complete repairs within 60 days and the entire complex will be ready Sept. 1.

Housing maintenance increased their employees from 40 to 70 men with most of the increase being college and high school students. Furniture of Jardine was tagged and moved to temporary storage areas in Campus buildings. From Thursday morning until Sunday evening, the crews worked from 7:30 a.m. until dark, tagging and moving furniture.

Edwards said that Michael McCarthy, executive mayor of Jardine, opened his apartment as an emergency housing office to assist other Jardine residents.

North Campus Courts also were damaged. Nine trailers were damaged and eleven severely shaken in the storm according to university officials.

Campus shrubbery and trees were extensively damaged in the storm; trees were uprooted and limbs broken. Goodnow Residence Hall had 80 windows broken while Marlatt had 40. A few windows were lost at West, Moore, and Kramer Food Center.

Officials reported extensive damage to the roof of Derby Food Center and some damage to the roof of Waters Hall. Other campus buildings had some roof damage and broken windows.

A DAY OF DISC GOLF

Campus course challenge

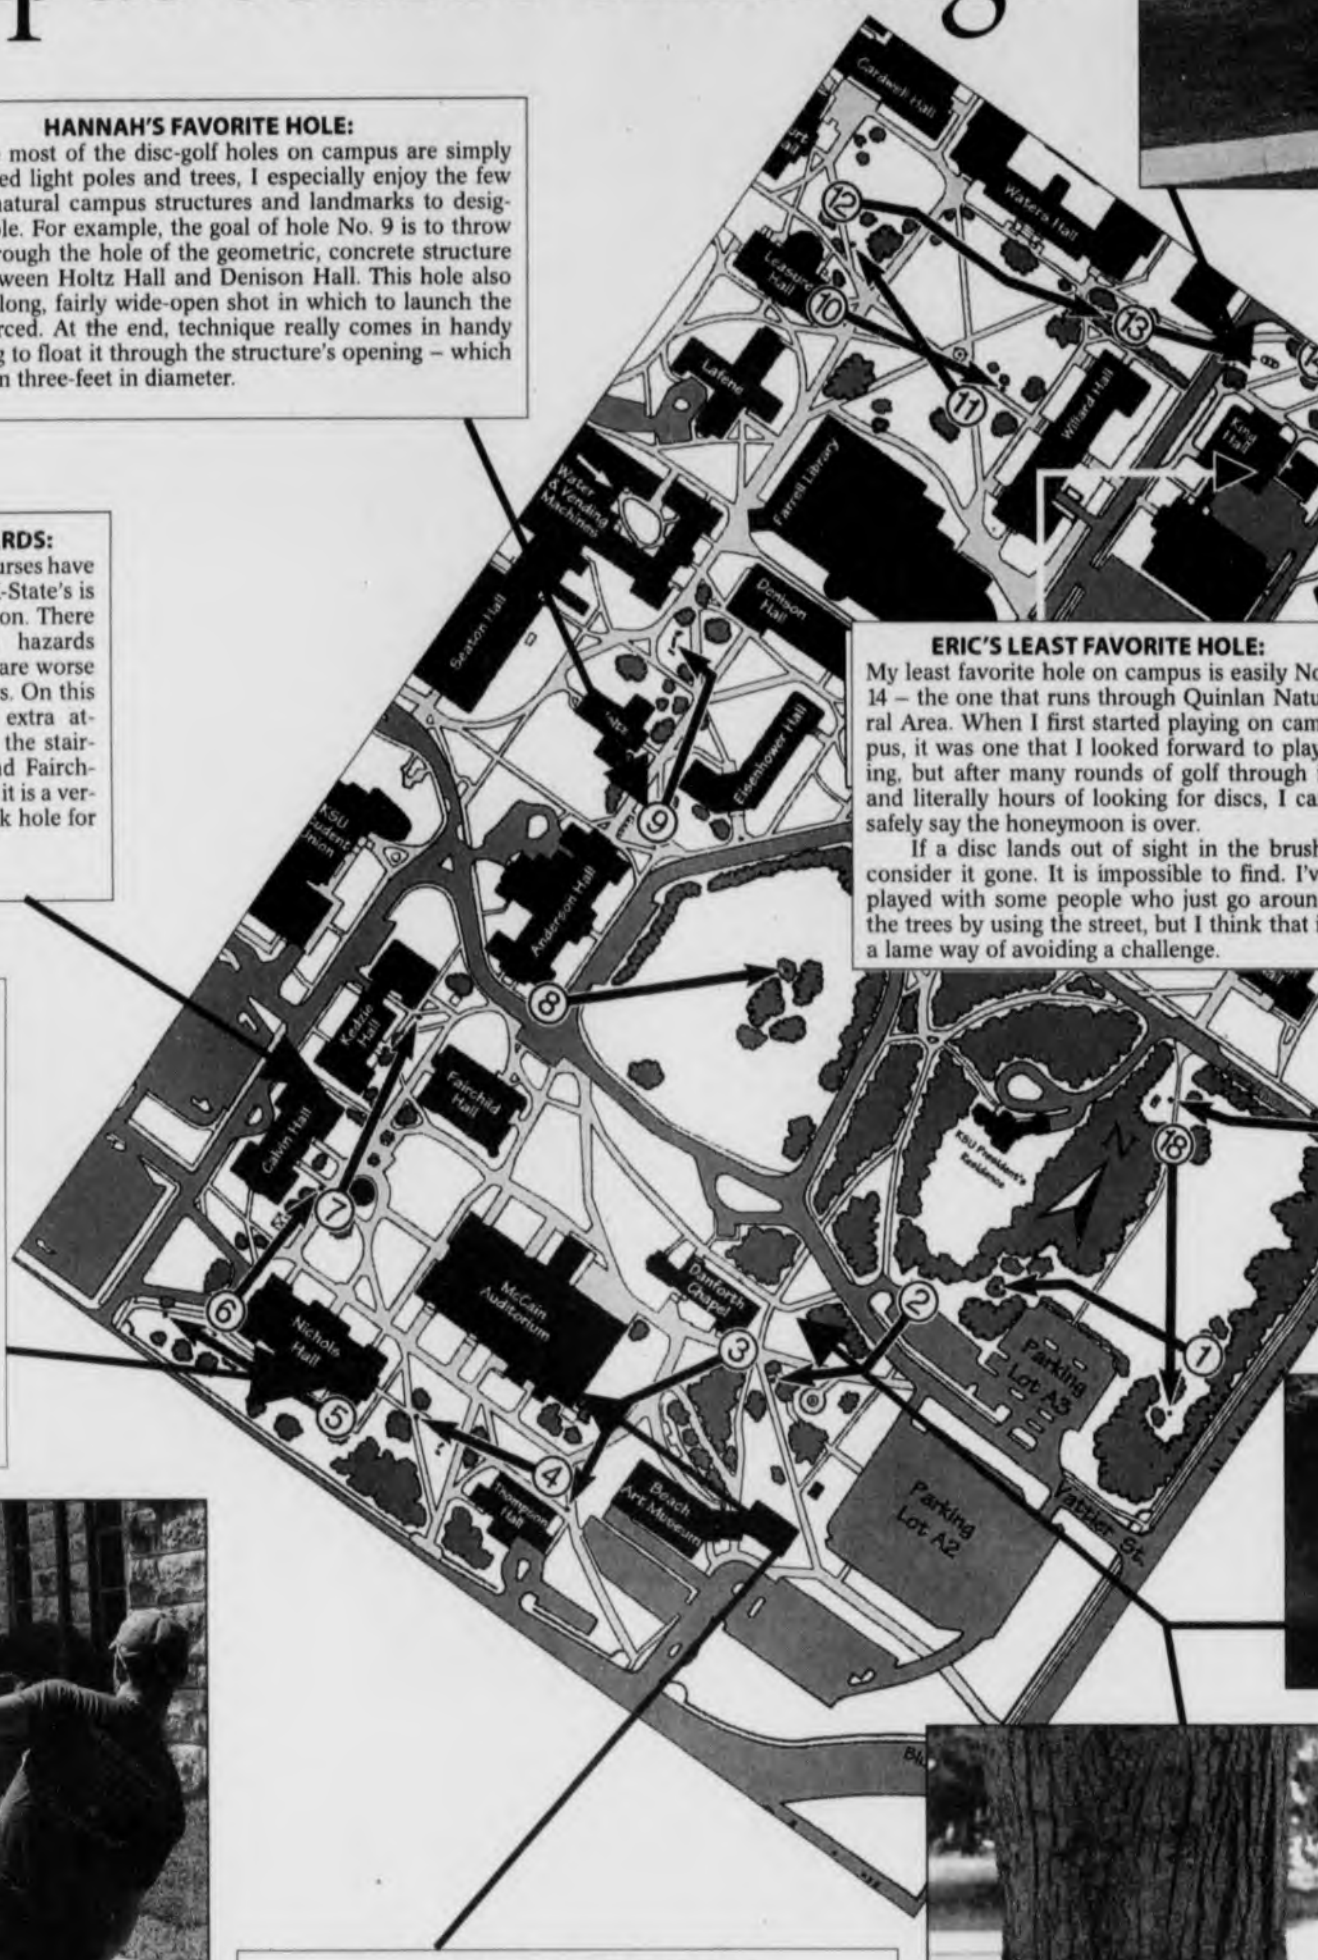
Matt Binter | COLLEGIAN

HANNAH'S FAVORITE HOLE:

Because most of the disc-golf holes on campus are simply spray-painted light poles and trees, I especially enjoy the few that used natural campus structures and landmarks to designate the hole. For example, the goal of hole No. 9 is to throw the disc through the hole of the geometric, concrete structure located between Holtz Hall and Denison Hall. This hole also provides a long, fairly wide-open shot in which to launch the disc full forced. At the end, technique really comes in handy when trying to float it through the structure's opening – which is more than three-feet in diameter.

HAZARDS:

All golf courses have hazards; K-State's is no exception. There are many hazards and some are worse than others. On this hole, pay extra attention to the stairwell behind Fairchild Hall as it is a veritable black hole for discs.



ERIC'S LEAST FAVORITE HOLE:

My least favorite hole on campus is easily No. 14 – the one that runs through Quinlan Natural Area. When I first started playing on campus, it was one that I looked forward to playing, but after many rounds of golf through it and literally hours of looking for discs, I can safely say the honeymoon is over.

If a disc lands out of sight in the brush, consider it gone. It is impossible to find. I've played with some people who just go around the trees by using the street, but I think that is a lame way of avoiding a challenge.

ERIC'S FAVORITE HOLE:

Far and away my favorite hole is No. 5 – the one that runs behind Nichols Hall. It's my favorite because there are so many different ways to get into and out of trouble. Your disc can just as easily end up in the middle of Anderson, stuck in a tree or trapped in one of the corners of the stonewalls. My favorite way to play the hole is by skipping my disc on the sidewalk that runs from the tee box to right by the hole.

COURTESY PHOTO

Matt Binter | COLLEGIAN

HANNAH'S LEAST FAVORITE HOLE:

Very few of the holes on campus are unpleasant to deal with, but there are a couple I could live without. However, my least favorite hole is No. 3: A long, left-hook shot around the Beach Museum of Art. Not only is it slightly uphill, but it is impossible to even see the light-pole target you're aiming for. Also, a fence to the right proves as a hazard for wayward discs, and a giant stairwell to the left also can ruin a perfect shot.

WATCH YOUR DISCS

All discers, newbies and veterans know that discs have a destructive side. Errant throws can easily break a window or leave lasting scars in the trees left on campus after the tornado.

For more about the Hannah and Eric's disc golf adventure view the videos at www.kstatecollegian.com.

Discs to use on the course

DRIVER

Drivers are generally used for the first shot off the tee. They go the farthest, but are harder to control than mid range discs and putters. They also typically weigh more. There are many different types of drivers that are used to perform different shots. There are S-Drivers that cut an "S" in the air as they fly and there are drivers that are designed to hook left or right, depending on the disc.

MID RANGE

Mid Range discs are used like irons in traditional golf. While some experienced disc golfers are able to throw these just as far as drivers, most golfers use them for shorter distances for added control. Depending on the way the disc is thrown, it can cut to the right, to the left or in the hands of more experienced golfers, straight as an arrow into the basket.

PUTTER

Putters are the shortest-range discs in the bag. They are used for the last shot of the hole, unless the golfer made an amazing shot with the mid range. These are the lightest discs, and an experienced golfer can use these to skillfully bend the shot around a tree or into the basket.

First-time golfers should play with course veterans

HANNAH BLICK

I've only golfed once in my life. It was a couple years ago, and I was trying to impress a boy. Needless to say, I was horrible and we only lasted nine holes. It was hot, boring and by the end of the day, I was covered in bug bites. So, when I decided to try disc golf, I was a bit skeptical.

We started out the K-State campus course with a few quick lessons in throwing the discs and what types of throws and distances each specific disc was used for. I learned quickly that there was much more technique and skill to the game than I had originally thought.

I struggled through the first couple holes, but luckily I played with Eric Davis, senior in print journalism and Collegian news editor, who had played on the campus course before. For those new to disc golf, I suggest heading out with a friend who has experience and can point out all the trees and light poles that serve as holes. Though the campus course is fun and fairly manageable, it isn't marked as clearly as it could be, and did confuse me at times.

One of my favorite shots was the second hole because I had to maneuver the disc across Vattier Street and through a grove of trees to hit a light pole east of All Faiths Chapel. This shot seemed like it would be too challenging, but it was much more forgiving and an encouragement to pursue the rest of the 18-hole course.

Disc golfing is also a relaxing way to spend a morning or afternoon with friends. I enjoyed the leisurely pace and felt it familiarized me with some areas of campus I had never seen before. For example, on No. 6, behind Calvin Hall, I discovered a quaint fountain and sitting area I had never seen before. It was located under a giant, metal tower and complemented by daffodils and decorative rocks; a plaque on one of the concrete benches explained that the area was a memorial to one of broadcast radio's forefathers. I love finding pleasant niches on campus to spend 15 minutes of my day reading or napping.

Also, because it is a full course, the 18 holes on campus circle from one end of campus all the way around, passing through areas around the K-State Student Union, the quad, Hale Library and even near the residence halls. So, disc golfers can look forward to finding all kinds of surprises around campus while playing the course.

Though it was more than 90 degrees and humid outside during our Sunday afternoon round of disc golf, it didn't put too much of a damper on my energy. At nearly every hole, there was a water spigot to drink from, and unlike a bare golf course, you're surrounded by shady trees and buildings that can provide a brief escape from the heat and bugs if needed. Not to mention there is a bathroom about 20 feet away from most of the disc-golf holes on campus.

Kansans choose state's 8 wonders; Foundation to offer more polls

By Aubree Casper
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Few will ever be able to see the internationally known "Seven Wonders of the World." For most Americans, it is just physically and financially impossible. However, there are similar and highly feasible alternatives right here in Kansas.

Marcie Penner, director of the Kansas Sampler Foundation, said she found inspiration early in life to encourage others to travel around the state and educate themselves on what Kansas has to offer. The Foundation, Penner said, was created to "preserve and sustain rural culture" in Kansas.

Penner and her father originally set out to create guidebooks for rural Kansas towns, and after finding that most residents felt their communities had little to offer, she noted that all towns have eight basic aspects that create clever and interesting appeal. These eight elements of rural culture include architecture, art, commerce, cuisine, customs, geography, history and people.

Following this experience, Penner and the Sampler Foundation decided to compose the "8 wonders" list instead of just seven, as is the format for the Seven Wonders of the World. The reason for the eight spots is the need to acknowledge the eight listed elements of rural Kansas.

A nomination field of 24 Kansas landmarks was then created to start the search for the final eight. Ultimately, the finalists were determined through public requests, and the research of the Kansas Sampler Foundation's Selection Committee.

After the announcement of the finalists, Kansans were asked to vote through e-mail or an official paper ballot to determine the Eight Wonders of Kansas. The foundation said the Eight Wonders were chosen entirely by the popular vote of Kansas residents and were announced January 30, 2008. The current Eight Wonders of Kansas include the Big Well, Cheyenne Bottoms/Quivira National Wildlife Refuge, the Eisenhower Presidential Library and Museum, the Kansas Cosmosphere and Space Center, the Kansas Underground Salt Museum, Monument Rocks and Castle Rock, St. Fidelis Catholic Church and the Tallgrass National Preserve and Flint Hills.

With the success of the Eight Wonders, Penner said that the Kansas Sampler Foundation plans to continue their project by providing people with the opportunity to vote on eight more series of wonders, one for each of the elements. The voting for one of the elements, the Eight Wonders of Architecture, continues through June, when the winners will be announced.

The voting and announcement of the other seven elements will follow over the next few years. Penner said the cycle of voting and announcing the wonders of the other elements will occur in about a four month cycle. To check out the wonders and vote yourself, visit www.8wonders.org.

Vote for Riley County's 8 wonders

According to an old Lenape tribe translation found in a May 2006 article in the New York Times, the word "Manhattan" is often translated to "island of hills." While the majestic Flint Hills and Konza Prairie surrounded by the Blue and Kansas rivers certainly boast this meaning, seven other Riley County landmarks deserve their time in the spotlight on the Collegian's compilation of the "8 Wonders of Riley County." Some of these locations are ones at which most Manhattan residents and visitors are sure to have stopped at or heard of, and a few are often overlooked. Some might have significant historical value, while others are simply perfect for a quiet Saturday afternoon. After you've read about each "wonder," stop at the Collegian's Web site – www.kstatecollegian.com – to vote on the top wonders of Riley County.

Hutchinson salt mine largest in hemisphere

Hutchinson is located in South-Central Kansas, quietly nestled between Wichita and Hays. Most visitors flock to the town of 40,787 for a trip to the famous Kansas Cosmosphere and Space Museum. As one of the Eight Wonders of Kansas, the museum has had no trouble attracting tourists and students since its opening in the 1980s.

AUBREE CASPER

However, one Hutchinson attraction – also a wonder of Kansas – is often overlooked.

The Kansas Underground Salt Museum, according to a museum tour guide, is the largest underground salt mine in the Western Hemisphere. While such a feature might not grab the attention of potential visitors, the history and magnitude of the museum that visitors are exposed to during a tour is unlike anything offered in the United States.

After being asked to sport a hard hat and breathing apparatus (in case of emergency only), tourists take a dark ride in a rickety elevator 650 feet underground. Visitors then emerge into a dimly lit, endless tunnel surrounded by walls and ceiling entirely composed of natural salt. A tram tour highlights the mine system's most interesting features.

Once the tram tour is over, an area is available for viewing pictures, historical displays and videos about the salt mine. Guests are even able to "mine" their own complimentary salt pieces during the tour to take home.

One part of the underground museum not well known to outsiders is the large storage area. Because the mine is so far below ground, the temperature remains at a constant 68 degrees year round with almost no humidity, which is conducive to storing important artifacts and documents.

In fact, the museum currently displays some of its more famous acquisitions including the guns used in the movie "Men in Black," the costumes for Jean Girard and Mrs. Ricky Bobby in "Talladega Nights," as well as the costumes of recent remakes of "Batman," "Superman," and "The Matrix." According to guides, much of the movie industry chooses to keep such items, in addition to movie and television reels and government documents, in that climate.

Just a two-hour drive from Manhattan, 45 minutes from Wichita and four hours from Kansas City, the Kansas Underground Salt Museum holds both geographical and cultural wonders and is well worth a visit.

The Incredible Hulk

The green monster hits the big screen again, this time the action is ready in full force

"The Incredible Hulk"

★★★★½

Movie review by Matt Binter

Marvel kicked it up a notch this time around with its latest movie, "The Incredible Hulk."

This remake is one of my favorite comic-book movies, and similar to director Jon Favreau's "Iron Man," released earlier this year, this flick has the perfect mix of action and strong plot lines.

This movie doesn't link directly to the 2003 released "Hulk," but it helps to have a basic understanding of who Bruce Banner, "the Hulk," (Edward Norton) is before you see this version.

The film opens with Banner hiding from military pursuers in Portugal. He already has the ability to transform into the Hulk and is learning to control his anger while searching for a cure for his state. Running out of options and under pressure from his military pursuers, Banner meets with a specialist named Mr. Blue, whom he believes will be able to cure him.

When Banner finally makes it back to the U.S., he runs into his old girlfriend Betty Ross (Liv Tyler) and they work together to find the cure for his greenish condition. Banner struggles to restrain his feelings for Ross in order to prevent a himself from warping into the Hulk. However, when he loses control, his feelings have complete control of his fury.

In an attempt to apprehend the Hulk, a soldier named Emil Blonsky (Tim Roth) enhances himself in the same way Banner did and transforms into "the Abomination," and naturally, a battle of good verses evil ensues between the two superheroes.

"The Incredible Hulk" has trumped its predecessor in several ways. When I saw the 2003 "Hulk," I had to watch it twice because I lost interest halfway through. "The Incredible Hulk," however, grabbed my attention from the start. Also, the technological advancements made over the past five years increased the quality of the special effects and helped create a stunning display of digital animation. Norton is an amazing actor and was the perfect choice for the role of Banner, fulfilling all of my expectations of the comic-book superhero.

The only complaint I have is that the movie was a little rushed. The film went from one scene to another quite rapidly, particularly toward the end. But because the movie is only two hours long, it's understandable why cuts had to be made, for time's sake.

I recommend people see this movie, and since it covers a large spectrum of genres including action, comedy and romance, it will appeal to almost everyone's tastes.

Lohan show will die quickly

"Living Lohan"

TV show review by Whitney Hodgin

If Lindsay Lohan is a train wreck, her mother is the conductor. The new reality series on the E! channel, "Living Lohan," revolves around the rest of the two-dimensional family still living in Long Island, and is a pathetic parade of talentless loudmouths. Dina Lohan, Lindsay's mother and manager, and Lindsay's 14-year-old sister, Ali, who "wants to be just like Lindsay," insist they created the show to dispel vicious rumors surrounding their family, but the 30-minute segments only prove how true those rumors are.

Dina, whose botched face would not bode well on high-definition TV, is cognizant enough to say everything a good mother would say in regard to her brood. Her authoritative and motherly voice constantly reminds the camera that the Lohans have a normal family that juggles soccer practice, high school and fame with the grace and how-to of a seasoned Hollywood bunch.

Either Dina is a much better actress than Lindsay, or the show's editors deserve an Emmy, because this family is far from normal. Dina is grooming her second cash cow for a life of false appearances, all the while lying to the camera through her pearly white smile.

And though Lindsay has yet to appear on the show, her face is plastered everywhere in the house, providing many a photo-op for Ali (who seems to be suffering from Stockholm Syndrome) to point out the similarities between her and her sister. According to the Lohans, Ali is going to be the next best singer/songwriter.

Shame on the Lohans for fooling us once. Shame on us if they fool us twice.

I love to hate the Lohans, but this show just makes me feel sorry for them. At times Dina and Ali look so much like Lindsay I want to call Child Protective Services because they both act like spoiled children. If Dina really wants to improve her family's reputation she shouldn't ask her assistant to Google search each of their names on national television to further publicize their negative press. I can't wait to see what downward spiral Dina swirls the Lohans into next.

New director of sustainability hopes to add bike racks, recycle centers

By Mayra Rivarola
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A new director of sustainability was appointed by the Student Governing Association in response to student demand, said Lydia Peele, president of SGA.

"We were talking with our students and asking them how to improve our campus, and they said sustainability," she said.

Michael Bell, senior in architectural engineering and appointed director, said the sustainability movement on campus has only been a whisper but is now building momentum.

"You are not going to be able to open the Collegian or walk around without seeing something that we are doing regarding sustainability," Bell said.

His goal as a member of the president's executive cabinet is to get students involved and excited about issues regarding sustainability, he said.

This issue was raised last January when K-State received its sustainability report card, and almost failed, said Ben Champion, K-State co-director of sustainability.

The score was issued by the Sustainable Endowments Institute, which evaluated large colleges and universities in North America, Champion said.

"K-State scored a D+, which is low in comparison to other universities in the Big 12," he said. Bell said he is already working on a university-wide student campaign starting in the fall, which will culminate at a conference on sustainability issues.

"This state-wide conference at K-State will be a turning point in K-State's history, from the way we've done things to the way we should do things now," said Bell.

He also said he plans to improve the existing recycling program.

"We want better recycling facilities," Bell said. "We want more bike racks, to encourage students to ride their bikes."

Public transportation and a green certificate on new buildings at K-State will also be on his agenda, he said.

LEED, Leadership in Energy and Environmental Design, is a rating system developed by the U.S. Green Building Council, determining if a building is energy efficient, said Bell.

"We want to push the administration to require that any new building will be LEED certified," he said. "Current buildings are not even close to being LEED certified."

If the new leadership studies building and the expansion of the Recreational Complex are to follow these principles, they will be one of the first LEED certified university buildings in Kansas, he said.

"We can't claim to be a sustainability example now but we can be an example on how to turn it around," said Bell. "We want to impress them this time by having an A."

Students are becoming more passionate about sustainability and environmentally friendly practices and they can now express themselves through the Student Sustainability Coalition, he said.

The student coalition is designed to take members from every campus organization and address issues of sustainability, said Champion.

"We hope that most student groups will send a representative to sit on this coalition," said Champion, who is also vice president of the coalition. "This will encourage campus-wide student dialogue."

The student coalition is designed to give a voice to K-State students on anything related to sustainability, said Peele.

"A part of the group's mission is to educate students and assist the student government when it comes to any policy or projects that are going on with sustainability," she said.

Dads, sons bond over basketball

By Brad Dornes
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Nathaniel LaRue | COLLEGIAN

Brady Cox, Hesston, Kan., tears into dinner at the father-son basketball camp Saturday night.

For years, the bond between a father and his son has been forged around a campfire or on the hunting grounds, but K-State's Department of Intercollegiate Athletics is trying to bring fathers and sons together on the basketball court.

Boys grades kindergarten through eighth grade and their fathers stepped onto the floor of Bramlage Coliseum on June 13-14 with wide-eyed enthusiasm.

Dave Paulson, 43, and son Jake, 10, of Charlottesville, Va., attended the camp for the second-straight year.

"We are most excited about learning some drills that we can do together in the driveway," said Dave.

Jake shared his enthusiasm. "The camp is a lot of fun," he said.

The Father-Son Basketball Camp was started under former K-State basketball coach, Jim Woolridge, and Bob Huggins carried on the tradition. Since Huggins departed for West Virginia last year, his replacement, Frank Martin, has also continued the camp.

Andy Assaley, director of basketball operations, came to K-State from Cincinnati with Huggins and said he was not sure if they were going to continue to offer the basketball camp.

"We were uncertain of how it was going to go," said Assaley. "We had so much fun doing it that it has become far and away my favorite camp."

The number of father-son tandems was limited to 100 pairs, said Assaley, because the coaches and players wanted to be able to interact with the campers.

"We wanted to teach the dads, so that they may better teach their sons," Assaley said. "But the focus of the camp is to allow fathers and sons the chance to bond with basketball being the centerpiece."

Assaley and a staff of college and high-school basketball coaches, along with some returning K-State basketball players, led the camp. An emphasis was placed on the teaching of fundamentals.

Jacob Pullen, sophomore guard, was one of the returning players that worked side by side with the children.

"I watched the camp last year, but I was unable to work at it," Pullen said. "This year I am able to work with the kids and am just happy to be here."

Along with the father-son camp, K-State is offering two more basketball camps this summer. Those camps include an Overnight Individual Camp on June 26-29 and a Day Camp on July 14-17.

FARM | Students harvest lettuce

certain vegetables like lettuces and mushrooms. The students harvest the crops by hand, as well as hoe, weed and cover their plots with hay manually.

Last Wednesday, June 11, three of the interns, Janke and Guilford harvested a portion of their red leaf, green leaf and romaine lettuce, as well as kale – a type of cabbage.

On their knees in the dirt, the interns cut the heads of lettuce out of the ground and brushed the excess soil off the stem. They then filled several plastic tubs with cold water from a spigot and dipped each head in the water until it was clean. The lettuce and kale heads were then laid out on a homemade wire rack to dry in the warm morning sun.

"After they all dry," Magelli said, "We'll take them right away back to [Throckmorton Hall] and get them in the freezers so they're nice and crisp for the market."

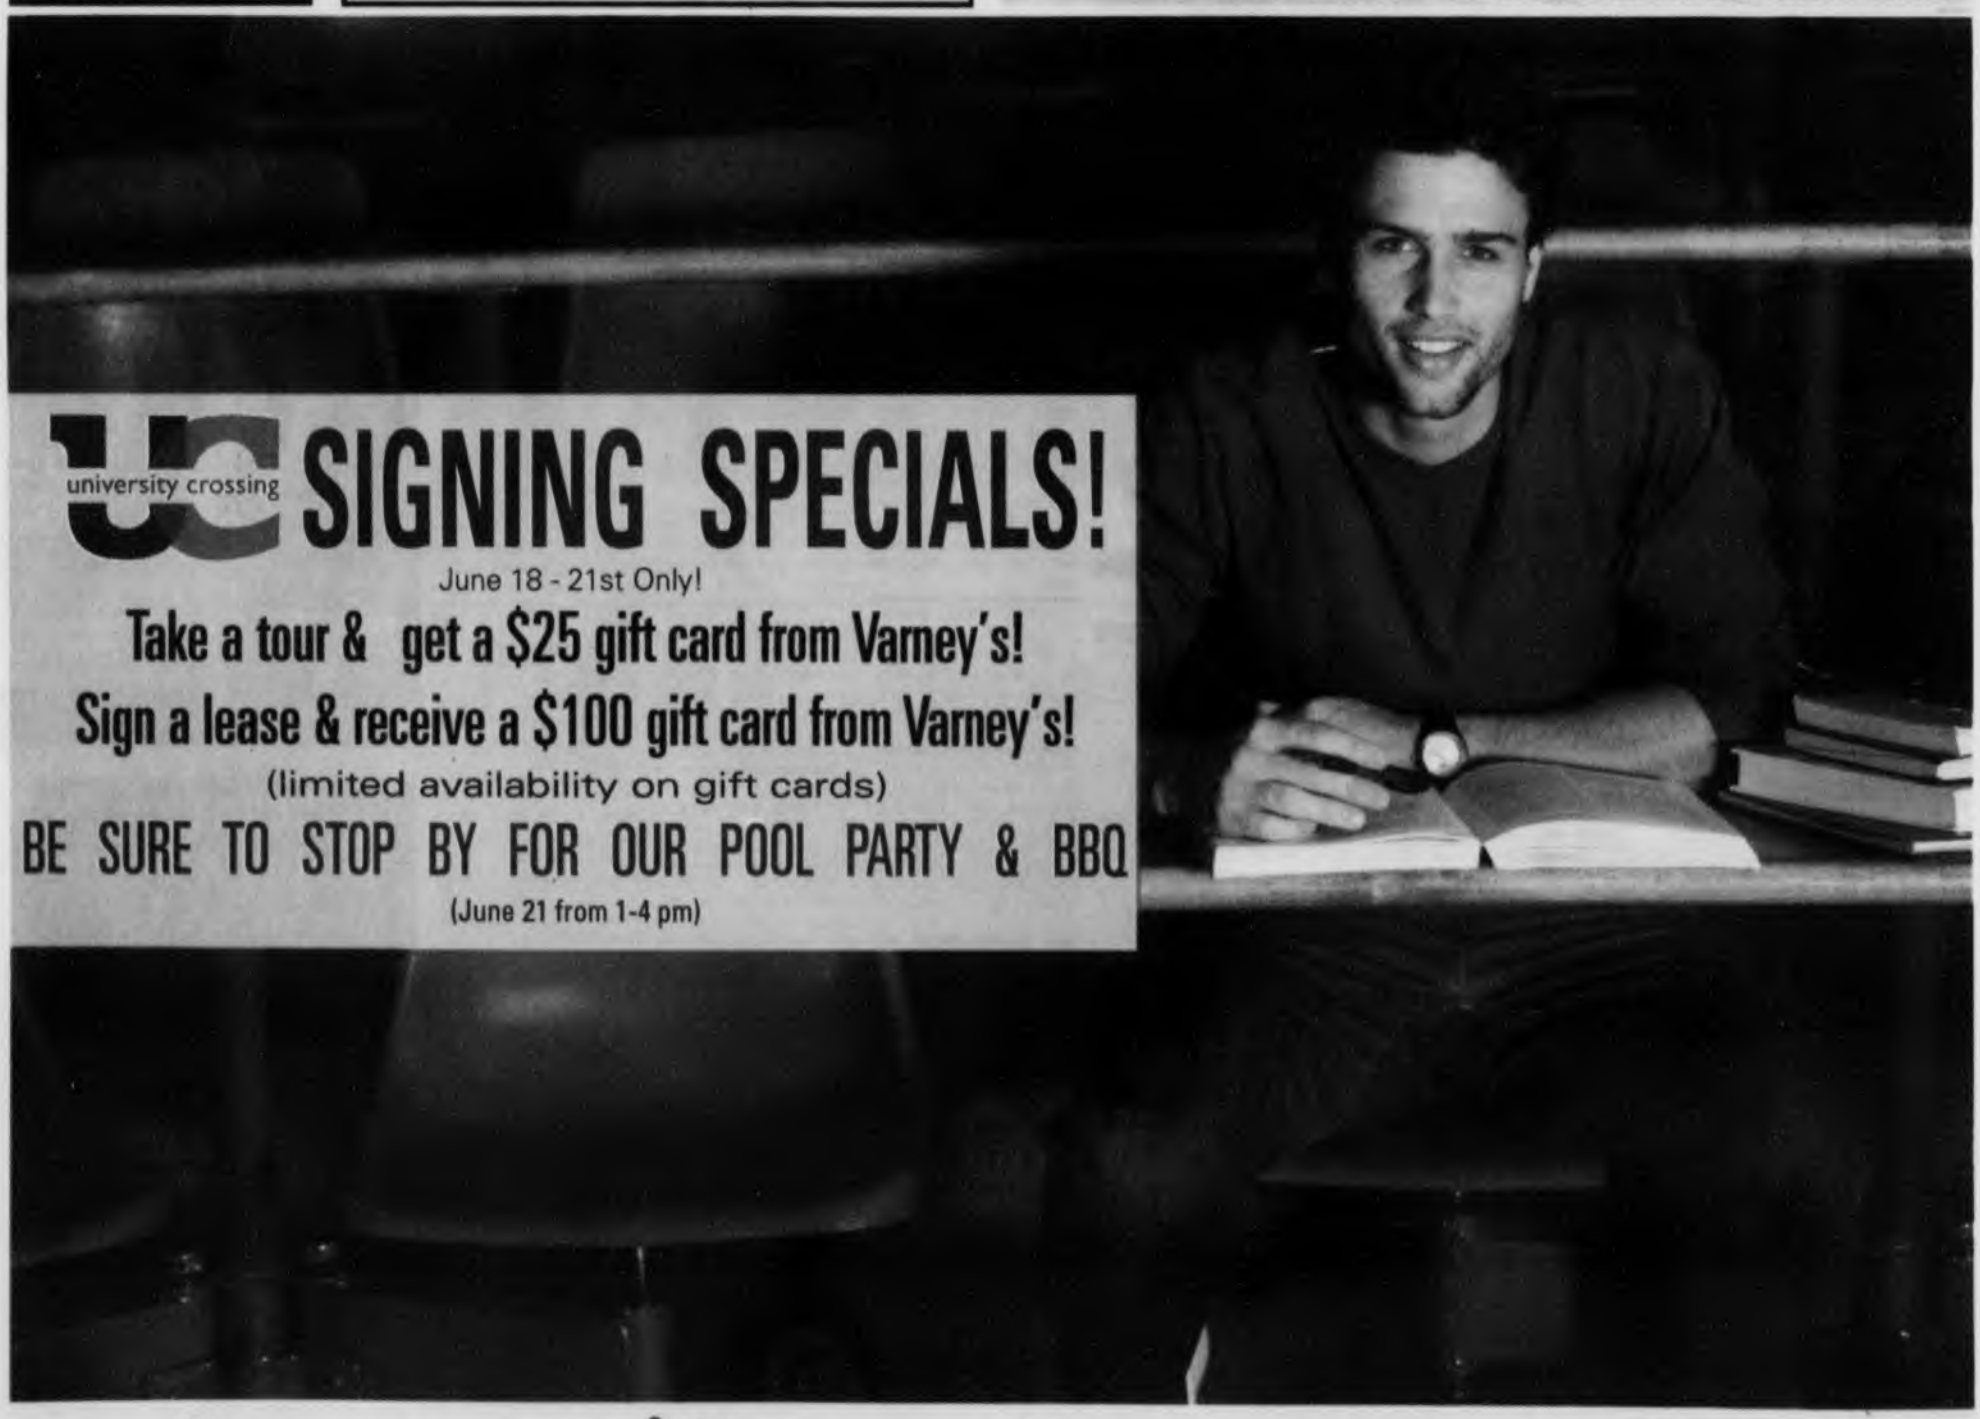
FROM HARVEST TO MARKET

Bright and early every Saturday morning, at about six, Magelli and Unruh-Carey said they gather the produce from two freezers in Throckmorton and load in a truck to take to the farmer's market, located at 5th and Humboldt streets. They said they make sure to clean all the produce and arrive at the market's parking lot, allowing themselves enough time to set up their booth, complete with a Powercat tablecloth and hand-drawn sign of a weeping willow tree, symbolic of the farm.

Later, the girls arrive, and help put the finishing touches on the produce arrangement, making sure the spinach leaves spill from their wicker baskets just right, and the mushrooms peep up at potential customers in a clean and cheerful way.

"Most of our customers are return customers. And Europeans." Magelli said, as Pyzhov reached over him to spritz some dry spinach leaves with water. "We try to keep everything looking fresh for market appeal."

Unruh-Carey said the interns had been somewhat nervous about how they would be received at the market, but that other vendors have been gracious and helpful over the last few weeks.



"We weren't sure what to expect, we didn't want to step on anyone's toes," he said. "But they have all been so great, we've made friends with a few of the other people. They really want to support K-State."

Besides taking their produce to the farmer's market, they have also started selling some vegetables at Call Hall, and Janke said they have been talking with the Derby Dining Center about possibly selling them some produce to serve to students.

Student dies of natural causes

By Hannah Blick
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A K-State student died of natural causes June 15 in his Manhattan apartment, according to Heather Reed, assistant dean of student life.

Shaun Alden McDonald, junior in hotel, restaurant, institution management and dietetics, appeared to be in full health, and his death came as a shock to many who knew him, said his academic adviser, Betsy Barrett.

Barrett said Shaun had served in the U.S. Army and was stationed at Fort Riley for a couple years before attending K-State. While in school, he worked in the kitchen at Bobby T's Bar and Grill on Kimball Avenue. She said Shaun's outgoing, friendly nature will be missed by students and faculty with whom Shaun worked.

Kevin Roberts, assistant professor of hotel and restaurant management, said he had instructed Shaun in one of his major's courses.

"He was the kind of student you get to know," Roberts said. "He always spoke up in class and had an opinion on what we were studying."

Barrett said she thought Shaun's major was a perfect fit for him.

"He loved people and he loved food, and he just worked really hard," she said.

Shaun is the son of Alden McDonald of Villa Ridge, Mo. There will be a funeral service at 11 a.m. Friday at Bell Funeral Home in Pacific, Mo.

Injuries prove fatal for K-State student

By Salena Strate
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Alex E. Studer, sophomore in agribusiness, died Friday at the Mitchell County Hospital, Beloit, Kan., from injuries sustained in an automobile accident, according to Heather Reed, assistant dean of student life. Alex is the son of Mark Studer and Kerry Benson, both of Beloit.

Alex was born April 9, 1988 at the Mitchell County Hospital and graduated from Beloit High School in 2006. He was involved in various sports there, including football, basketball and track. Alex was initiated into the National Honor Society his senior year and also placed sixth in the shot put at the Kansas state high school 3A track and field meet that year. Throughout his life, Alex spent a great deal of time outdoors fishing and hunting with his father.

Alex had just finished his second year of college at K-State. He had been asked to join Sigma Alpha Lambda, a leadership honorary.

Funeral services were 2 p.m. Monday at Beloit First Christian Church. Alex was buried at Elmwood Cemetery in Beloit, Kan. McDonald Funeral Home in Beloit was in charge of arrangements. Memorials can be made to the Joe Studer Educational Fund in care of the funeral home.

Juneteenth festival offers Manhattan opportunities to come together and honor African-American heritage

Across the street from the Douglass Community Center, Douglass Park usually sits silent and nostalgic, waiting for the occasional child to visit its playground. Saturday morning, however, the park came alive with a beautiful mix of colors to celebrate Juneteenth. A variety of vendors offered down-home cooking, glass pictures of Martin Luther King, Jr. and a special history book.

Ms. Geraldine Baker Walton chose the Juneteenth celebration as the perfect occasion to reveal her new book "140 Years of Soul: A History of African-Americans in Manhattan, Kansas." Walton, a fourth-generation Manhattanite, was also the grand marshal for the Juneteenth parade. Walton has served on the Juneteenth community council for more than 19 years.

"I think the fact that I have worked with them [Juneteenth community council] for years and the fact that my book is now out, they are just proud of me and they wanted to show appreciation," she said. "I'm glad to see people buying my book – it's just a good day."

Walton signed copies of her book all afternoon and made an effort to add a personal message to each book that was sold. Her book talks about the great challenges African-Americans living in Manhattan have faced, but Walton said it tells only the beginning of the story for African-Americans in Manhattan.

Walton's book can be found at Claflin Books and Copies or ordered online at www.kspublishinginc.com.

Rose Ogutu, a K-State alumnus from Kenya, said she came to the Juneteenth celebration because she was interested in its history.

"Some of the performers and a mixture of people had very good speeches," Ogutu said. "The new speaker system was a big improvement from last year."

WHAT IS JUNETEENTH?

Also known as Freedom Day or Emancipation Day, Juneteenth is an official holiday in 29 U.S. states. It is celebrated on June 19 to commemorate the announcement of the abolition of slavery in Texas.

Juneteenth celebrations include a wide range of festivities such as parades, street fairs, cookouts, music, dancing and even contests of physical strength. Baseball and other popular American games are also often played.

Storms fail to halt campus construction

By Eric Davis
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Despite a tornado, heavy rains and one of the hardest winters in recent years, K-State's various construction projects continue to progress.

The tornado was the latest significant setback, but the projects have been mostly cleaned up.

"The worst the tornado did to us was dump a bunch of debris in [the site] that we had to clean up," Lawrence Murray, head of labor, said about work on the K-State Student Union parking garage.

Murray also said the rain last week flooded the lower level of the project, so his men had to spend time pumping out excess water. The large amount of rain has also prevented crews from pouring concrete, which pushes the completion date back even further. He said last winter's weather contributed to the earlier delays.

The parking garage project wasn't the only on-campus construction zone that suffered from bad weather during June. The circle drive project near McCain Auditorium has recovered from the tornado and is up and running again.

The project at McCain, which has been on the drawing board for more than 20 years, will feature a plaza and car drop-off zone that will allow easier access for Student information system transition continues with movement of financial records to iSIS Friday

By Brad Dornes
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State's new student information system, iSIS, will take another step toward full implementation on June 27 when the next phase goes into effect. This phase involves converting student financial records from the old system, KATS, to iSIS.

Jennifer Gehrt, director of the university's legacy application systems empowered replacement project LASER, said this phase is just another step in continuing to move students' information from KATS to iSIS.

"After this phase is completed, students will be able to see all their vital information at the Student Center screen at any time," she said.

Once this phase is completed, iSIS will be almost fully operational, Gehrt said.

"All that is left is converting students' historical data and producing transcripts before iSIS is fully complete," she said. "The deadline for the completion of iSIS is October but we feel that it should be up and ready around the beginning of the school year."

Though there are some procedural differences between KATS and iSIS, Gehrt said there are also certain areas that will remain unchanged for this next phase.

"The process of viewing and paying bills will remain the same," Gehrt said. "Students will continue to pay their bills through CASHNet."

CASHNet is the online cashiering application used by the controller's office.

Jim Badders, assistant controller, said billing for the upcoming fall semester will be done completely on iSIS.

"We are working to set up the student financial system," he said. "Our main focus is to get all the tuition information ready for the fall."

Once completed, this phase will allow all incoming freshmen to view all their information on iSIS.

Jessica Bigger, academic adviser for the A.Q. Miller School of Journalism and Mass Communication, said her students have not experienced any problems with iSIS.

"There is definitely a learning curve," Bigger said. "But enrollment for incoming freshmen has been going relatively smoothly and they have been getting into the classes that they have wanted to enroll in."

Work on the next phase will begin at 5 p.m. on Friday and continue until the following Monday.

During this time, students will be unable to view or pay bills on their online student accounts.

Students invited to share design, lecture hall ideas for interior of leadership building

By Brad Dornes
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Office of Leadership Studies and Programs will sponsor a meeting Thursday to gather ideas for the interior of its new building.

The meeting, which will be from 11 a.m. to 4 p.m. in the K-State Alumni Center's Tadtman Boardroom, will allow staff, faculty and students a chance to speak with LSP building architects to discuss the details of the new leadership building design.

An official groundbreaking took place at the site of the new building on April 18.

It will be a three-story structure located on the west side of Campus Creek along Mid-Campus Drive at the junction of Old Claflin Road and Petticoat Lane.

The new building will contain a theater-style lecture hall, classrooms, a workroom for student ambassadors, a student lounge, a leadership resources library and administrative offices. It will contain over 34,000 square feet, in contrast to the 5,000 square feet that house the leadership program today.

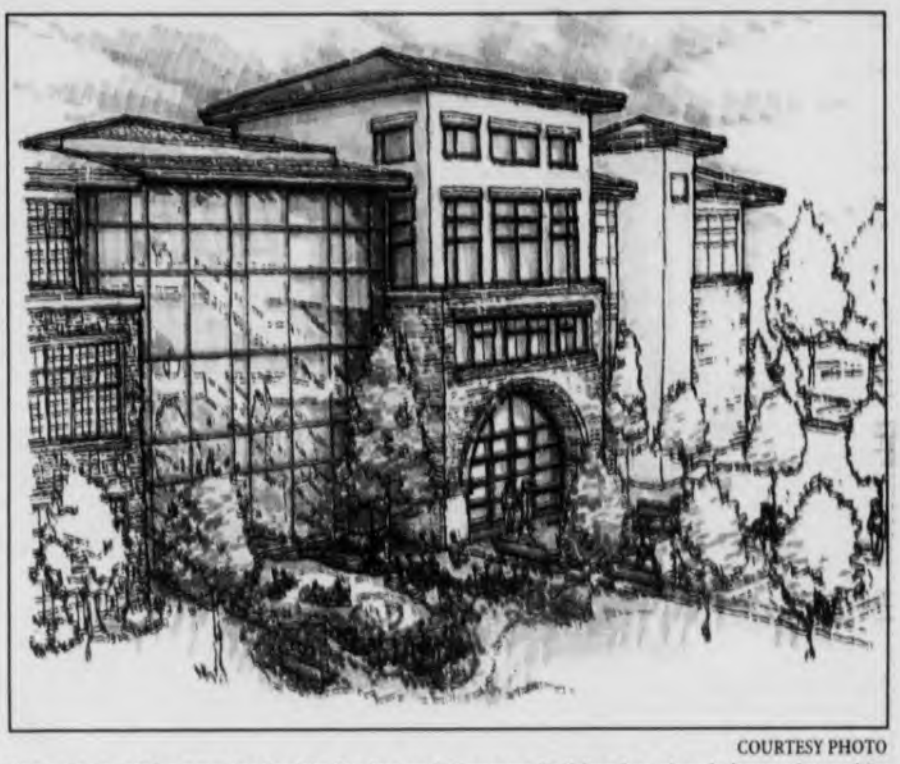
The entire program, with more than 1,400 students, is currently operated out of two houses on Manhattan Avenue that are rented by the university.

Susan Scott, assistant vice president and director of leadership studies and programs, said the meeting will give faculty and students the chance to become involved in the decision process.

"Our goal is that the architects will have enough raw data to work with," she said. "The building as of right now is estimated to cost $10 million."

Scott said the leadership building would soon be one of the most prominent buildings on campus.

"We as a faculty have a dream that the leadership building will be a home, like how the library is home to academic activities and how the student union is home to student activities," she said.



Mary Tolar, associate director of civic leadership, said that the leadership building is a wonderful opportunity for the entire university.

"Students are the center focus of the university," Tolar said. "We are looking forward to allowing our students to learn in a state of the art facility."

The new leadership building will be only the second building in the entire nation dedicated solely to the study of leadership.

Brett Beier, senior in business management and marketing with a minor in leadership studies, is the operations chair for leadership ambassadors and said the new building should create excitement for the program.

"It will just be good to have the Civic Leadership and Leadership programs under one roof," Beier said. "Our numbers are growing every day and the building will provide a great learning environment."

The exterior of the new Leadership Studies and Programs building has already been planned by LSP building architects, but the interior design will be open to students' design ideas.

Small-business struggle

Residents should appreciate, support local merchants

AUBREE CASPER

The City of Manhattan's mission statement says: "The mission of the City is to sustain order and protect public safety, promote public health, preserve the built and natural environment, and enhance economic vitality. The City of Manhattan supports a regional community in which individuals and families develop and thrive."

"Thrive" is an interesting word in this context, especially in a city with fierce competition between mom-and-pop businesses and corporations that often end up putting their local competitors out of business. Not only does Manhattan rely on locally owned small businesses, but identities of cities across the United States have been built on the single business.

In St. Louis, Mo., the Anheuser-Busch brewery and manufacturing plant not only employs more than 7,000 residents and sponsors a major league baseball stadium, the business has created a 160-year American tradition.

Unfortunately, all good things must come to an end, and increasing economic pressure might force the brewery to sell out to a foreign competitor, according to a June 21 article in the Kansas City Star.

While St. Louis residents, Anheuser-Busch workers and the American public have begun to revolt against the idea of Belgium company InBev taking over the company, the idea of a fading, homegrown business being bought out is not unfamiliar to today's small, local businesses in the U.S.

According to a Wells Fargo/Gallup Small Business Index report released in May, "six key measures in the index continued to reflect a drop from the previous quarter."

"The nearly 50 percent drop in the index clearly reflects the intensified financial pressures small business owners have felt over the last three months," said Scott Anderson, Wells Fargo senior economist.

Residents of towns where the economy is largely based on small businesses don't need fancy numbers to tell them their local businesses are in trouble, though.

For proof here, look in our own town. At the end of Poyntz Avenue, where local businesses have thrived for decades, stands Manhattan Town Center. It typifies the American shopping mall, where consumers are more likely to spend their money since chain stores create a predictable and more comfortable shopping experience.

Following Tuttle Creek Boulevard north from the mall, there's the case of Bob's Diner, a local late-night favorite of college students that now sits across the highway from national 24-hour behemoth IHOP.

The city could be blamed for allowing such this blatant conflict between large and small to happen (though it isn't much of a surprise since the creation of a "Community Marketing Strategy" found on the City's Web site was outsourced to a Maryland firm), but local residents are the ones who make a difference.

Congress hosts a Committee on Small Business and Enterprise at the national level, but it is up to us as average citizens to come to the rescue of failing local businesses.

By purchasing milk at Call Hall instead of Wal-Mart or buying a formal dress in one of the local shops downtown, we are giving small local businesses another breath of life. "Box" stores are sure to have what we need, but local businesses often offer the same thing or an even better alternative.

Buying locally is not only the best way to shop but it can lead to some great finds. The prices at local shops might sometimes be a little more than what we want to pay, but those shops give more back to our towns than we can ever imagine. Jobs, a healthy tax base, a cultural identity, and more environmentally-friendly methods help our cities thrive.

Small local businesses are an American tradition. Brave individuals who lived to meet and exceed the needs of Americans and improve quality of life built the United States into what it is now. Whether in St. Louis or Aggieville, these owners and employees deserve everything a worker at Target or McDonald's is offered, like insurance benefits.

Big corporations are important to America and always will be, but we need to take time to shop and promote the local businesses that provide the foundation for our economy and overall existence as a relatively content Kansas town.

Teens' baby boom reflects problem with culture, not sex education classes

JESSICA HENSLEY

As the school year came to a close for high schools across the nation, 17 girls at Gloucester High School in Gloucester, Mass., were expecting babies – more than four times the number of pregnancies the school had last year, according to a June 18 Time magazine report. Some people dismissed this sudden spike in teen pregnancies as a fluke.

Others looked to pop culture as the culprit.

But as school officials continue to investigate, a very different picture has begun to emerge – one which will once again spark the debate about sex education in America's public schools.

According to a survey conducted by the Kennedy School of Government, Gloucester High is part of the 47 percent of U.S. public high schools that follow an "abstinence plus" curriculum.

This means that while abstinence is stressed as the best option for STD and pregnancy prevention, other forms of birth control are also discussed. Gloucester's school committee plans to vote later this summer on whether to start providing contraceptives as part of the class.

Unfortunately, providing contraceptives and information on pregnancy prevention will do little to solve the problems currently plaguing Gloucester High.

Time first reported that nearly half of the expecting students confessed to making a pact to get pregnant by the end of the school year.

Though one of the teens has now said it was a "baby-raising" pact for existing pregnancies, not a pact to actually get pregnant together, the question of why 17 girls – none over the age of 16 – in one school would be pregnant in the first place remains, for the most part, unanswered.

But lest you begin to think that sex education itself is to blame, it is important to remember that according to numerous studies conducted by both private and governmental agencies, educating teenagers about the use of contraceptives does not increase the rate of sex among teens, but rather, increases the rate of safe sex among teens.

In light of this, one would be remiss to use Gloucester High as an argument against sex education in schools.

Clearly, though, something needs to change. According to a study by Planned Parenthood, there was a three-percent increase in teen pregnancies in 2006 – the first such increase in 15 years.

It is easy to blame the schools and a general lack of education about sex, but as is evident in Gloucester, the schools are not to blame. So who or what is?

Some school officials and medical professionals who are dealing with Gloucester High have speculated that these girls' pregnancies have more to do with a desire for direction in life than anything else.

In an interview with Time, one of the girls' classmates simply said, "No one's offered them a better option."

We need a change in our culture. If many American students are growing up believing they have no better options for the future than becoming teen parents, something needs to change.

It would be wrong to look at the situation in Gloucester as a problem with the school or a problem with the town, because in reality, it is indicative of a national crisis in our culture.

It reflects a crisis of confidence in our youth, too many of whom are coming of age without hope for the future and without real options.

This, more than sex education and contraceptives in schools, is what should concern us most as a society.

TO THE POINT

Stampede attendees should respect Manhattan

TO THE POINT is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

This weekend, thousands of country music fans will flock to Manhattan and Tuttle Creek State Park for the annual Country Stampede, bringing their RVs, alcohol and straw cowboy hats with them. Local stores, however, know concertgoers also come equipped with something slightly more valuable: spending money.

While Manhattan's businesses benefit from the influx of cash Stampede brings to town, the four nights of concerts and parties often end up spilling into our respectable and quiet community.

Drunk, out-of-control Stampede attendees can be seen all across Manhattan, from sunburnt, scantily clad women running barefoot through Manhattan Town Center, to obnoxious, bellowing grown men loading their carts with 24-packs of Natural Light beer in Wal-Mart. These partyers disrupt people who are trying to go about their everyday routines in their own town.

They honk their horns and drive irresponsibly, clog parking lots and forget to tip their waitresses, carhops and bartenders.

Everyone should enjoy a wild time occasionally, but letting completely loose and abandoning all reason and courtesy is simply not necessary.

This does not mean Stampede visitors are not welcome in Manhattan or that community members should tell them how to celebrate during one of the nation's largest country music events. However, people from out of town should keep in mind that they are guests here in Manhattan and even without Country Stampede, the Little Apple is a thriving, family-friendly community.

Concertgoers should respect the boundaries of Manhattan, where families and non-country music fans live and sleep at night, and keep their partying within the limits of the festival grounds at Tuttle Creek.

FAITH UPDATE

CrossRoads campus ministry stresses non-denominational approach

By Jenna Scavuzzo
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

CrossRoads of ECM campus ministry has worked passionately to create a welcoming and non-judging environment for students to explore their faiths and themselves. Now, participants in CrossRoads' programs are encouraging more students to look into the little-known ministry's services and fellowship.

While many worship groups on campus tend to focus on certain Christian denominations, the CrossRoads ministry is designed to welcome and bring students from multiple denominations and beliefs together, said David Jones, campus pastor.

"CrossRoads occupies a fairly unique position with the university," Jones said. "CrossRoads isn't representing any particular church group or denomination. It's about having an open stance that attempts to bring people together, to encourage students from different beliefs and backgrounds to come together and find we have more in common than we do differences. It's about students exploring their personal faiths, having interfaith dialogue and building friendships."

REACHING OUT TO ALL

The CrossRoads ministry began in 1921, and was Presbyterian for its first 40 years. In the '60s, it became multi-denominational and placed more emphasis on the unity of the Christian church.

Jones said he thinks the least-known aspect of CrossRoads, which is located in the Ecumenical Campus Ministry building, is its activities to welcome both religious and non-religious students.

Jones said he understands students can feel hurt or confused about religion, and he wants CrossRoads to be a place where students can feel safe and comfortable with their feelings and discover their personal faiths. He said the ministry is a place to experience and belong, and students won't be judged for having questions.

"I think many students often misunderstand CrossRoads," he said. "People aren't sure what we stand for. We want to be a hospitable community where people can figure out what they believe in and how they should live their lives. I think in this culture, people tend to get a lot of attention for far-left and far-right beliefs, and we're a group that stresses moderation and humility. God calls us to walk humbly, but culture doesn't celebrate quiet moderation."

CrossRoads offers a variety of services and activities for students. The ministry provides Sunday night dinners and fellowship, since the residence halls do not serve food on Sunday nights. It also features Bible studies, yoga classes, international friendship dinners, community service and alternative spring break opportunities, and co-sponsors the Movies on the Grass film series.

"Most people have heard of CrossRoads, but don't know too much about what we're about," he said. "We're trying to figure out how we can let the university know who we are, and that we have something positive and constructive to offer."

INCREASING AWARENESS

Jones said he thinks the best way CrossRoads can raise campus awareness of its services is through continuing to present the ministry positively. He said he thinks the best way to get students involved is through word of mouth, and when word starts to get around, more students will begin to see the ministry as a place to be comfortable in.

"Lots of Christian groups do a good job of reaching out to their own denominations," he said. "But not a lot of us do a good job reaching out to those who are hurt or doubting. Our culture gives up on people too quickly, and we help students who are questioning begin the process of growing. We don't have to be the biggest or most popular campus ministry – that's not our goal. We just want students to begin living out the mission effectively and reflect the love of Jesus Christ."

Nathaniel LaRue | COLLEGIAN

The CrossRoads Ecumenical Campus Ministry building is located on Denison Avenue across from the Engineering Complex. Its auditorium is used for everything from worship services to classroom space.

STUDENT INFLUENCE

Jones said there is a core group of about 45 students who participate in at least one of the ministry's activities on a monthly basis. He said about 25 students attend the weekly Sunday night dinners.

Some students who participate in CrossRoads' ministry said they became especially devoted and appreciative of the campus ministry over their time in the program.

"CrossRoads is a welcome, open environment for students of all ages," said Kendra Prick, a recent K-State graduate and participant.

Other students appreciated the different opportunities the ministry provided.

"CrossRoads is a great place for fellowship," said Kyle Walters, a recent K-State graduate and participant. Walters went on several mission trips over spring break, attended Sunday night dinners and participated with the ministry's Worship Outreach Team.

"It's very supportive, and anyone can come in and use its facilities," he said. "It's a very open-armed and welcoming opportunity."

SUMMER SOLE SPECTACULAR

Peep toe, metallic styles popular

If you don't have a shopping pal like Kelly from YouTube.com's infamous "Shoes" video, our summer shoe guide can help you decide which shoes are must haves and which pairs are so last season. From flats to flip-flops, these sizzlin' summer styles can complement any outfit or summer event. Casual and dressy, versatile and bold – outrageous footwear is what this summer is all about.

SANDALS:

The standard style most people turn to when the weather gets warm, these internationally appreciated summer shoes have gone from uncomfortable plastic beach wear to flashy accesssories worn even to meet the President of the United States. Though it's hard to beat Old Navy's rainbow selection of $3.50 flip-flops, high-end shoe stores carry popular metallic, low-heeled, strappy sandals that cost anywhere from $10 to $80, according to most shoe retailers. Made of almost any material imaginable, including bamboo, plastic, "jelly" material, canvas and leather, sandals can be worn any and every day in the summer. Popular styles this summer include leather gladiator sandals and thin, strappy metallic pairs that complement jeans and a tank top or a semi-formal dress for a wedding or night out with the girls.

HEELS:

The best time to play with fun, crazy high heels is summer. According to Style List's Web site, bold prints and wedge heels are summer shoe staples, and sometimes the dress that goes with a great pair of summer heels becomes more of an accessory than the shoe itself. Like sandals, the big trend in fancy heels is peep toe metallics. This retro style is more comfortable than the pointed-toe shoes that have dominated the last few years' trends in heels, since the heels are typically wider for better support, and the slingback and wedge styles make standing for hours at a party or walking to class much easier. In particular, wedges are popular and available in canvas material or madras print. Ankle straps and shoes that wrap around the upper foot can also be found easily for a sexier look. Don't be afraid to put a pair of hot pink heels with a simple white cotton dress, either. Just remember, the bolder the better with summer heels. Most of these shoes range in price from less than $20 at Target or Old Navy more than $300 at BCBG or Steve Madden.

FLATS:

The universal, all-seasons flats have taken over fashion in the last few years. While a great pair of simple, black flats can get you through winter, spring and fall, summer is the best time to show off a pedicure while looking cute and having good foot support. Another easy way to dress up any outfit, a pair of neutral-colored peep-toe or closed-toe flats works with almost anything in a closeet. Playing with a little heel, color and style make these slip-on favorites the number one summer shoe must-have. The world of flats also includes moccasins, found in many shades of brown or black and often embellished to complete the look with a pair of skinny jeans.

COURTESY PHOTO

TENNIS SHOES:

While flip-flops and flats rule the shoe world during the summer, there are a few times when open sandals or heels just won't work. The best alternative when you need a little more coverage are lightweight, sleek tennis shoes. From Pumas to Converse, these shoes for the summer aren't as limiting fashion-wise as they were in the past. Color is key for these types of shoes and a mainstream piece of footwear won't limit individuality if you are willing to sport yellow, polka-dot Converse All-Stars or silver, red and black Pumas. These more exotic tennis shoes are great to wear during a trip to Tuttle Creek State Park or a walking tour while on vacation without having to compromise your fashionable sensibility.

TV ON DVD

Apocalyptic drama set in Kansas deserves new audience

If nuclear bombs destroyed 23 major U.S. cities, would your family survive?

BRENDAN PRAEGER

That's the premise of "Jericho," a short-lived drama that aired on CBS. Set in a fictional town in western Kansas, the series shows a small town's fight for survival against roving gangs, nuclear fallout and other horrors in the wake of a devastating terrorist attack.

Despite critical praise, CBS canceled the show after one season because of poor ratings. Angry fans bombarded the network's office by sending more than twenty tons of peanuts, a reference to the season finale. After donating the peanuts to various charitable causes, including Greensburg, Kan., CBS decided to give the show a second chance.

The show returned earlier this year with more poor ratings and met its end after only seven new episodes, but CBS released the second season on DVD last week, offering a chance for new viewers to see the series.

Don't be fooled by its poor ratings – "Jericho" deserves your attention.

The first season begins on the morning of the attacks in September 2006. The citizens of Jericho see a mushroom cloud from Denver, but are otherwise oblivious to the full scope of the attacks. They later learn that 23 cities have been hit, including Washington, D.C., which was destroyed during the president's State of the Union address.

As the series progresses, the citizens are forced to survive with limited news from the outside world. They endure power outages, gas shortages, hunger and attacks from roaming gangs of mercenaries.

The show explores several interesting storylines throughout the first season. One of the most interesting involves a family that moved to town on the morning of the attacks. The father, Robert Hawkins, buries a mysterious package after the bombs go off. His extensive knowledge on the effects of nuclear fallout suggests that he has more information about the origins of the attacks, a storyline that plays out brilliantly over the course of the series.

As tensions build with a neighboring town, the first season ends with the town at war.

The second season, with fewer episodes, moves at an alarming pace. A new military presence shifts the focus of the series from survival to the development of a new country.

The country has split into three groups: the United States, the Allied States (formed by the states west of the Mississippi River) and Texas.

The show examines the new government's control over every aspect of society. Federal employees rewrite history, monopolize commerce and maintain stifling control of the media. As the citizens of Jericho lose faith in their unelected leaders, some of the characters fight to expose a secret that might change the outcome of the impending civil war.

"Jericho" includes multiple storylines and a detailed history, so it's easy to see why new viewers didn't latch on to the show the second time around.

Don't make the same mistake. "Jericho" is an excellent show, and it examines themes not usually seen in the majority of television dramas.

BEYOND JERICHO

Based on the highways mentioned in the show, the real location of Jericho would be Oakley, Kan.

The series was filmed in Van Nuys, Calif., which explains the mountains in the background of multiple shots, a rarity in western Kansas.

MAKIN' A LIST

Life list provides serious, fun goals

HANNAH BLICK

When I was 14, I made a list. I didn't tell my mom or even my best friend. In fact, for a while, I felt silly for carrying that same folded piece of notebook paper around in my wallet. But now, more than six years later, I still have that list of 30 things I want to experience and accomplish in my life.

I wrote the list after I realized how many people in the world say they have goals, but then never actually pursue them. I wanted to make myself accountable, to have something tangible that could push and inspire me as I traveled through life and also be a record of my experiences.

The goals on the list range from highly significant achievements like No. 1: "graduate from college" and No. 27: "adopt a child" to the tiniest feats like No. 2: "learn how to whistle" and No. 15: "make a complete scrapbook." So far, I have checked eight items off my list, including No. 7: "learn to drive a stick shift" and No. 14: "get a tattoo."

I can't remember what drove me to write the list, or even how I have managed to hang on to it all these years, but I do know that I am determined to cross every last item off before I die. The point of the list is not to rush through it just to finish, though, but to enjoy completing each individual goal. Along the way, I've made memories with friends and family that I will remember every time I read the dates and locations penciled in next to the firm check marks.

When I was younger, I always wanted to squeeze every last drop of toothpaste out of a fresh, unused tube, but my mom told me that was wasteful, so it was definitely something I wasn't allowed to try my eager hands at. So, No. 23 on my list is "empty a whole tube of toothpaste." I'll never forget when late one night last year in the basement of Marlatt Hall, three of my friends and I spent an hour playing with the cool, goopy toothpaste after I excitedly squeezed it out of its tube in less than 10 seconds.

Simple goals like this remind me of how young I really was when I set out to write my list. I've checked off No. 16: "have my first kiss" and No. 24: "get my driver's license," but there are still some girlhood dreams yet to be experienced, like No. 3: "go skydiving" and No. 21: "visit New York City."

As important as my list is to me, however, it also includes some completely random and seemingly meaningless goals like No. 5 "be in a rodeo," No 28: "dye my hair black" and No. 25: "attend a Bar Mitzvah." But as pointless as some of these goals might sound, each one was carefully thought through before it made the list. I asked myself questions like "Will I have fun doing this?" and "Will this broaden me as a person?"

I might not be a cowgirl, gothic or even Jewish, but hopefully these small glimpses into a different lifestyle will help me grow and also provide me with some entertaining stories to tell my children. And I can't wait for No. 26: "swim in the Atlantic Ocean" and No. 18: "drive a Mini Cooper."

Oz and tacos and windmills, oh my!

Reporter, photographer enjoy day-trip adventure at local community's attractions, eateries

MORNING: THE OZ MUSEUM

The Oz Museum is a great place to begin your day in Wamego. With more than 20,000 pieces of memorabilia related to the classic tale "The Wizard of Oz," the museum is a must-see for even casual fans.

Among the pieces currently on display is one of the last remaining flying monkey prop figurines, replicas of all the main characters' costumes and even an official death certificate for the Wicked Witch of the East from the State of Kansas.

The tour starts with a recreation of the scene in which the Wicked Witch of the East was killed by a falling house.

The museum features full-size replicas of costumes worn by the main characters. Though they look authentic, they are not the actual costumes from the movie.

Museum curator Betsy Riblett said a local resident built the replicas for his wife to use as lawn decorations during Halloween and then donated them.

The museum was slated to receive one of the four sets of original ruby slippers for the first Oztoberfest, but they were stolen from the Judy Garland Museum in Grand Rapids, Minn., before they could be delivered.

The museum recently received a large donation of artifacts and is changing its exhibits, said Ellie Coots, museum manager.

"We aren't closing at all during the switch," Coots said. "We are making the change one exhibit at a time."

One of the largest pieces in the new exhibit will include books from the original series written by L. Frank Baum.

Riblett said one book is an autographed copy of a first edition of "The Wizard of Oz." There are also dozens of books from all over the world that have been translated into many different languages.

The museum's goal is to get the new artifacts fully phased in to exhibits by Oztoberfest, which will take place the first weekend in October.

LUNCH TIME: DOWNTOWN

After the Oz Museum, stop by Javazo's Coffee or Toto's Tacoz to get a delicious taste of some locally owned restaurants.

When walking out the door of the museum, turn to the right and walk a bit to see Javazo's Coffee Bar. In addition to the restaurant, there is a flower shop in the back.

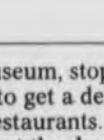
Javazo's offers a lunch menu featuring panini sandwiches, soups and salads in a quiet, relaxed atmosphere. The lunch special – a full sandwich, bowl of soup and a bite-size dessert – is a great deal that will leave your stomach and wallet full at the end of the meal.

However, if your stomach growls for Mexican dishes, turn left and walk for a few minutes after exiting the Oz Museum. Owned and operated by Craig and Colleen Lord, Toto's Tacoz was founded July 21, 2005 and immediately became a local favorite.

"We were slammed on opening day," Craig said.

Craig said they served lunch for two hours that day and had to stop when they ran out of food.

"I drove to Topeka, got more food and we opened back up for dinner at 5 p.m.," Craig said. "We ran out of food in an hour."



While the locals love the taco stand, one main problem is the amount of space in the dining room. Colleen said the couple wanted to "start small," so they only installed nine seats.

Over the years the growing demand for Toto's Tacoz prompted the Lords to expand and convert the empty space next door, resulting in significantly more seating for the restaurant.

Colleen painted all the decorations in the eatery, but the pieces that stand out are the murals of scenes from the Wizard of Oz.

"I have a thing about murals," Colleen said. "I just love to paint them."

LAST STOP: CITY PARK

Matt Binter | COLLEGIAN

The Wamego History Museum, located in Wamego City Park, houses various historical artifacts and exhibits including a large stuffed buffalo.

After the Oz Museum and a tasty lunch, a great place to spend your afternoon is Wamego's City Park. Just off Lincoln Street downtown, City Park is filled with both traditional and unusual elements.

While there are many parts of the park, the most noticeable is the Old Dutch windmill in one corner.

A Dutch immigrant built the mill in 1879, 12 miles north of its current position. In 1925 a 35-mule team moved the mill to where it now rests. When the mill was dismantled, the bricks were then numbered and placed in the same order in the park.

The mill is on top of a hill and surrounded by flower gardens with a path that runs around the hill. The path runs down the back of the hill and up to the Wamego History Museum.

The City of Wamego gave the park $30,000 to fix the mill, said Vera Smith, museum tour guide. Smith also said there are holes in the roof of the mill and many other areas that need to be fixed.

This would be the second museum stop of the day, but history buffs will find the various Kansas exhibits interesting. The tour starts with a horse-drawn buggy that was donated by a local family.

Follow the tour past a display about the old Ames House Hotel and down the ramp to the lower level, where a full-size stuffed buffalo and Native American arrowheads surprise visitors.

On the other side of the mill is a pond where visitors can sit and fish.

There is also a bridge that runs across the middle of the body of water.

By this time in the trip you should be ready for another break, and after walking around in the hot sun, a dip in the city pool is a relaxing way to finish off the day.

JUNETEENTH | African dance workshop offered

Juneteenth is a celebration in honor of the day the last U.S. slaves were freed by the Emancipation Proclamation on June 19, 1865 in Texas. Since then, June 19 has been celebrated as a turning point for blacks throughout America. The Manhattan Juneteenth celebration began in 1989.

"2008 is a really historic year in many ways. You have the [40th] anniversary of the death of Martin Luther King, Jr., a presidential election year where you have viable candidates that are both women and people of color and you have all those things going on, and we wanted to make people connect to what people had done in the past and what people are doing today," said Rhondalyn Peairs, member of the Juneteenth community council.

Peairs said the council used these significant events to create the motto, "Learning and Living the Legacy," for this year's event. She said the council also added African dance workshops to offer something new. The K-State African Student Union performed a traditional Ethiopian dance on stage during the welcome session and then taught the dance during its workshop lesson. Moses Khamis, graduate student in food processing and ASU president, said ASU participated in the event last year and wanted to add something more to Juneteenth.

"With the classes, we want to encourage those who like to know some African dances. There are many dances and this is just one set piece," Khamis said. "This event rings clearly to our minds because in Africa we also have independence days. So we feel like this is the same event – coming together and celebrating."

Manhattan resident Rheannan Weixelman, 10, saw the performance and said she was interested in the way the female dancers used the scarves to move with since she had never seen this style before.

Matt Binter | COLLEGIAN

Tirhas Gebre, junior in industrial engineering, and Yared Assefa, graduate in agronomy, perform a traditional Ethiopian dance on behalf of the African Student Union Saturday afternoon in Douglas park.

Other Juneteenth attendees praised the council for putting together the event. K-State men's basketball coach Frank Martin spoke about his experience with other cultural celebrations. Martin, whose ancestors were Cuban immigrants, said his forefathers wanted to be raised in a country where people had the ability to speak their minds. Martin said events such as Juneteenth made him look forward to being a part of the Manhattan community.

CONSTRUCTION | Plans for Jardine include bar

all visitors, said project manager Jack Carlson.

Carlson said a bus pick-up and drop-off point just off Vattier Street that will make it easier for large groups to visit McCain. Plans also call for more parking spaces along the edge of the drive. Some of these spots will be reserved for the handicapped, while others will be metered.

Carlson said the first phase of the project should be completed by Aug. 15.

The landscaping, benches and other cosmetic aspects of the area will be added later with an anticipated completion date of November.

The area in the middle of the circle drive will be left empty while money is raised for a World War II memorial, Carlson said.

Construction on Jardine Apartments, which was also affected by the inclement weather, is close to completion of its first phase.

Mark Taussig, associate director of facilities, said the next major additions will include a sports bar, coffee bar, restaurant and convenience store in Jardine's Plaza neighborhood.

The planners want the sports bar to have the same feel as some in Aggieville, but it will have definite differences from those in that area, Taussig said.

There are also major renovations being done to building D. Taussig said that while crews are not totally redoing the building, it should look like a new building when the project is over.

The second phase of construction will begin in about 18 months and will add even more bedrooms to the facility.

Church attracts students in new home

By Summer Allen
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

When students leave for college, they not only leave behind family and friends, many also say goodbye to churches they have attended since childhood. These students might come to Manhattan looking for a temporary church home, and increasingly, that new home has been Manhattan Christian Fellowship Church.

Located at 523 S. 17th St., Manhattan Christian Fellowship is one of the area's predominately African-American churches and attracts many African-American students and military families who come to the non-denominational church for fellowship and worship.

Bishop Darryl R. Martin has been the pastor of Manhattan Christian Fellowship for ten years. He started the church with his wife, Regina, on Nov. 16, 1997. Because the congregation consists of military families and college students, he described the 160 members as transient.

"Our congregates are usually here for a limited time, three to four years at best," he said.

Davida Jones, junior in psychology, transferred to K-State last year and said she wanted to find a new church.

She said she decided to go to Manhattan Christian Fellowship because of the positive and energetic environment that the students create. She also said she feels comfortable at the church because many of her friends attend the services.

"I feel I am able to grow spiritually and personally, with my friends," Jones said. "I am excited about that and feel that I have made the right choice for me."

This fall, new and old members will celebrate the opening of a new church building. The church will be located at 2600 Pillsbury Drive, off K-177.

With steadily increasing membership and a variety of ministries, Martin said there was a need for a larger facility and a place Manhattan Christian Fellowship could call its own. The church rents its current building, which does not offer much space. Martin said he feels grateful to have been able to use the rented property but thinks the congregation has outgrown it.

"Our ultimate goal, as with any church, is to build your own facility, so that you can have the liberty to establish objectives and goals that are attainable through your own ministry," Martin said.

"By having our own building, we're able to minister in much greater ways. We're excited about our new facility."

Dametria Steele, senior in social work, has been attending Manhattan Christian Fellowship since she began attending K-State.

She, like many other members, said she is excited about the new building.

"I have been fortunate enough to be a part of the continuous growth that our church has experienced," Steele said. "I am looking forward to what God has in store for my church family and our new building."

Weather permitting, the church's new building is scheduled to be finished by the end of October.

Nathaniel LaRue | COLLEGIAN
The new building for Manhattan Christian Fellowship Church is currently under construction and slated for completion in October. It is located a few miles outside of Manhattan on K-177.

Campus volunteer center works with community for tornado recovery

By Joel Aschbrenner
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State Volunteer Center of Manhattan was created last year to help campus and local service organizations work together. In the wake of the June 11 tornado, that work is needed more than ever.

Less than a year old, the volunteer center was founded to provide community service opportunities on and off campus.

The center was commissioned and awarded a $100,000 grant by Student Governing Association on July 1, 2007, and celebrated its grand opening to the public six weeks ago.

"It started with an awareness of a need," said Mary Tolar, associate director of civic leadership. "We had a lot of students who were interested in serving in the community, and a lot of potential partners in the community and no real mechanism to connect the two."

Bridging that gap and building links between campus and community groups was the main reason for the volunteer center's creation, said Lynda Bachelor, the center's coordinator.

The K-State volunteer center is one of more than 300 volunteer centers aided by AmeriCorps VISTA (Volunteers In Service To America), a national service group designed specifically to fight poverty. However, the K-State Volunteer Center of Manhattan, which has its offices in the KSU Foundation Center, is one of only nine located on a college campus, and one of only three to provide service on campus as well as in the surrounding community.

The center is also different from most in that it provides a way for students and residents alike to participate in service. This partnership between the university and the community has been important for the volunteer center.

"It went both ways for the first time," Bachelor said. "The thought was, 'We are a big community as a whole, so let's help each other out.'"

The K-State Volunteer Center has a three-pronged approach to better serve the Manhattan community, Bachelor said. The center runs several of its own volunteer programs, helps students create their own service projects and volunteer programs, and matches volunteers with existing programs.

The ability to recruit and organize volunteers proved invaluable after the Manhattan tornado. The center's full-time employees, four student coordinators and two AmeriCorps VISTA volunteers worked early the following day, manning phones and sending e-mails to recruit volunteers for the clean-up effort.

"I think we handled it really well," said Lucretia Helms, student coordinator. "We all woke up Thursday morning after the tornado hit, knowing we were going to have to get to work."

Volunteers for the center have been working with the American Red Cross, United Way, the cities of Manhattan and Chapman since the tornado hit.

Bachelor said being involved with different organizations in the community since the center was founded made it easy for the volunteer center to be involved with the clean-up effort.

"Because the community knew us, they called us and said, 'We need volunteers,'" she said.

Though the volunteer center did not have a large force, as many volunteers were home for the summer, the coordinators were able to answer the call for help by recruiting volunteers using several types of media. Helms said the student coordinators worked the phones, calling volunteers. They also were able to recruit volunteers through the center's Web site, www.1800volunteer.org; its Facebook.com group, Community Cats; and its list-serve.

The center's volunteers mainly picked up trash and debris throughout town.

Since it is a young organization, the volunteer center was not truly adequately prepared to handle an event like the June 11 tornado, Helms said.

"We didn't really prepare ahead of time," she said. "We are busy with all our own events, and we didn't see it coming."

She said the center's coordinators have been working with the city of Chapman to learn how to better prepare themselves for future disasters.

K-State e-mail scams continue

By Salena Strate
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State IT personnel will never ask for a password or user name through e-mail. That is the point university IT security officer Harvard Townsend wants to make clear to K-State students and employees. Since May 29, more than 30 e-mail scams have been reported, Townsend said.

"People really need to be cautious," he said. "The forms of scams are changing and it is very difficult to tell where the message is coming from."

One of the current scams tricks people into replying with their K-State eIDs and passwords. The fraudulent messages claim to be from the KSU.EDU support team and have a subject line like "update your KSU account now." Townsend said students and faculty should check the IT department's Web site at www.k-state.edu/infotech/security for postings of the current scams. Copies of the messages e-mail recipients see also appear on the Web site.

Townsend said one of the scam sources is actually sending the messages from a computer in Nigeria. He said if a hacker does break into a Webmail account, this person can send thousands of K-State scam e-mails to all accounts. Large e-mail providers will see the scam e-mails and believe the ksu.edu address is a scam account. When a scam is reported, Townsend contacts the e-mail provider to block the account. Sometimes the damage is already done, he said.

Attorney General Steve Six recently reminded Kansans not to give out personal information over the phone or in response to unsolicited e-mails. He said many Kansans have received automated phone calls claiming that their bank account information had been compromised. Six said people should never provide passwords over the phone or in an onlilne request. A financial institution would never ask users to verify account information on the phone or online, he said.

Area farmers see busiest time of year while working together to bring in wheat harvest

Matt Binter | COLLEGIAN

Wheat harvest is in full swing across Kansas, and Manhattan farmers are working hard to finish cutting their fields and delivering grain to the elevators.

By Hannah Blick
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

While the rest of the U.S. slows down in the summertime, taking a break from school, work and the daily grind, Kansas farmers prepare for one of their busiest times of year: wheat harvest.

Manhattan-area farmers have been harvesting wheat since Thursday afternoon, said Darin Marti, manager of the Manhattan grain elevator.

"We had our first dump Thursday at about 5 [p.m.]," he said. "[On Monday we did] about 30 dumps, and we should finish up in the next day or so."

Because Kansas had such a cool, wet spring, Marti said most farmers in the northwest part of the state are starting cutting about one-and-a-half weeks later than usual. He also said hail from recent thunderstorms and the June 11 tornado did hit some wheat fields south and west of Manhattan, but the damage was not too extensive.

"It's just good that we finally got started cutting," Marti said. "The longer we go without harvesting, the more wheat gets shelled out."

THE FARMER'S ROLE

Roger Naurth, Manhattan-area farmer, has been farming for about 40 years and said this summer's harvest has been fairly calm compared to years past. Naurth farms about 400 acres of land, and about 70 of those were planted with wheat this year. Naurth said when it comes time for cutting, he starts his day with a routine maintenance check of all his machinery, including the combine, which cuts the wheat off at the stalk and then shells the grain from the head.

Because harvest is the busiest time of the year on a grain farm, Naurth said most wheat farmers hire extra help to get through the weeks of cutting. Rodney Dembkowski, however, has been farming for about 16 years and works for Naurth year-round on his farm. Dembkowski said during summer wheat harvest, he typically operates the combine while Naurth drives the grain truck to and from the Manhattan grain elevator for storage.

"It's just how we've always done things," he said.

Mexican restaurant to open in Union

By Grant Guggisberg
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State Student Union will soon add a new restaurant to the ground floor where Union Station has served students lunch and coffee for years.

Salsarita's Fresh Cantina will offer students a healthier alternative when eating in the Union. Based on the highly successful concept of Chipotle, Salsarita's will offer students what's known as 'health-mex,' with fresh Mexican food prepared right in front of students as they order it.

"We hope to have the restaurant up and running by the start of school in the fall," said Tina Griffin, food service director for the Union. "That would most likely be somewhere around Aug. 21."

Before the restaurant can open, the current Union Station food counter, where a potato bar closed last semester, must undergo some remodeling and redecorating.

"We will be installing some new counters, as well as new equipment to grill meat and keep fresh vegetables cold," Griffin said. "We also want to make it look different and appealing for students."

In choosing to franchise with Salsarita's, Griffin said she conducted several surveys on what students would like to see in the Union.

"The Union Governing Board received a lot of student feedback indicating that a restaurant similar to Chipotle featuring 'health-mex' food would be popular," she said.

Once it opens in the fall, Salsarita's Fresh Cantina will have similar hours to those of other restaurants in the Union. Griffin said it will most likely be open from 10 a.m. to 3 p.m., Monday through Friday.

Beasley chosen 2nd in NBA Draft, Walker follows in 2nd round

By Brad Dornes
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Former K-State basketball player Michael Beasley was drafted by the Miami Heat with the second pick of Thursday's NBA Draft.

Beasley was the second of three-straight freshmen to be chosen with the top picks in the draft. A record ten freshmen were chosen in the first round this year.

As the second pick, Beasley is in elite company at K-State, behind only Howard Shannon in 1949 and Bob Boozer in 1959, who were both selected first overall, as the highest-picked Wildcats.

Miami, soon to be Beasley's new home, is also the former hometown of K-State head basketball coach Frank Martin.

"I'm ecstatic for Mike and for the Heat," Martin said. "It's a franchise, since Pat Riley's been there, that's been regularly in the [NBA] playoffs and won a championship just a few short years ago."

Martin also said Beasley and the Heat would be successful together.

"They are all about working and competing," he said. "I think it's a perfect marriage."

K-State students said they were happy about Beasley's high selection.

"It's really exciting that a player from K-State was picked so high," said Wesley Duey, senior in kinesiology. "It hasn't happened in a really long time that a player from this school was picked that high."

Beasley holds 30 K-State career, single-season and freshman records, as well as 17 Big 12 Conference single-game and single-season records.

"It is sad to see him go," said Cody Bitterlin, senior in finance. "It will be interesting to see who will step up and carry the load next season."

Beasley was not the only Wildcat selected in the 2008 NBA Draft. Bill Walker was selected 47th overall by the Washington Wizards.

"We are really happy for Bill and his family," Martin said. "We know that with the knee injury that he has some challenges ahead, but Bill has always overcome all sorts of odds to succeed. He is a fighter and will find a way to have success in the NBA."

Shortly after being drafted by the Wizards, Walker was traded to the Boston Celtics for cash considerations.

"[Boston] really believes in him and feels he can be a really good player," Martin said. "It's great to see him go to an organization that just won a championship."

FOURTH OF JULY REGULATIONS

Local law enforcement emphasizes legal fireworks to ensure safety

By Eric Davis
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Bottle rockets are popular choices for many when shopping for fireworks, but Manhattan residents will have a hard time finding the sky-high fireworks in the city limits.

Ryan Almes, Manhattan Fire Marshall, said bottle rockets are the only fireworks banned in the state of Kansas. The law states that all "aerial devices that launch into the air with the firecracker attached to a string of wire" are banned within the state.

Almes said fireworks that fit into that category go up in the air and explode with combustible material attached, greatly increasing the risk of fire.

To be sure legal fireworks are being purchased, Almes said consumers should check for the Department of Transportation seal of approval on the device's packaging.

"It should say 'DOT 1.46,'" Almes said. "That is the label for consumer class fireworks, but everything purchased in the city is legal to set off inside the city."

Almes also said that any resident who finds a commercial class firework should not disturb it and call the authorities immediately.

Almes said many people who do find these types of fireworks expect the fuse to burn slowly, which is why they are injured. The fire marshall said long fuses are "very fast" and ignite the explosive almost as soon as the flame hits the fuse.

While there are few regulations regarding types of fireworks allowed in the city, there are rules designed to make enjoying them safer.

"Fireworks cannot be thrown, cast or propelled in any way," Almes said. For those worried about time restrictions, fireworks can be set off between 8 a.m. and midnight until Friday.

There are also strict rules governing the sale of fireworks around the city, and members of the Manhattan Fire Department went from stand to stand Tuesday morning issuing permits.

Brandon Ratzloff, owner of Celebration Fireworks and junior in art, said he has enjoyed fireworks for as long as he can remember. He now has his own stand in the east parking lot of Bill Snyder Family Stadium near Peters Recreation Complex.

Ratzloff with the K-State athletics department for months to get his business off the ground and some of his proceeds will go to the K-State Cheer Squad. Though he is operating on university property, Ratzloff said the fire marshals were not very concerned about whether or not the stand was selling fireworks.

"The thing they were most concerned about was the 20-foot radius around the tent," Ratzloff said, referring to a range that must be protected to ensure no fireworks are unintentionally set off close to the tent.

Ratzloff also said fireworks are a lot safer than many of his customers think.

"They actually make them to burn at around the same temperature as paper," he said.

Lt. Kurt Moldrup of the Riley County Police Department said those caught with illegal fireworks or misusing legal ones will be issued a citation and will most likely have their fireworks confiscated.

Moldrup also said RCPD will have a normal full shift and no extra officers will be added to patrol the city on Friday. However, there will be a greater police presence for Thunder in Manhattan, the city's annual fireworks show.

For more information on Ratzloff's fireworks fundraiser, go to www.kstatecollegian.com this Friday for a full-length feature story.

Which fireworks are illegal in Manhattan?

- Large reloadable mortar shells
- Cherry bombs
- Aerial bombs, bottle rockets
- M-80 salutes
- Large firecrackers containing more than two grains of powder
- Mail-order kits designed to build these fireworks

City jazz festival features 6 groups

By Aubree Casper
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

This Fourth of July weekend will feature more than just fireworks and hot dogs in Manhattan.

Starting at 4 p.m. on Saturday in the Larry Norvell Band Shell at Manhattan City Park, the eighth-annual Little Apple Jazz Festival will kick off, providing music fans of all ages with the opportunity to enjoy the summer sun while listening to seven jazz groups on two stages.

Bands are set to perform everything from Dixieland to funk to Latin jazz.

This year's headliner will be The Lisa Henry Jazz Group.

Henry is currently designated as the international jazz ambassador to Africa.

Union Program Council helps sponsor the event each year. According to Beth Bailey, media relations director for UPC, jazz groups at the festival will include the Fort Riley 1st Infantry Division Big Band, El Mambo Orchestra, New Red Onion Jazz Babies and others.

Bailey also said hot dogs, lemonade, limeade and Hawaiian shaved ice will be available for purchase.

After the festival on Saturday night, the Groove Tiller Combo will keep the music going at Auntie Mae's Parlor, and The Kelly McCarty Trio will play at a jazz brunch from 10 a.m. to noon Sunday at Bluestem Bistro.

The event is part of the Arts in the Park series at City Park and is sponsored by the Manhattan Parks and Recreation Department as well as UPC, K-State Libraries and U.S. Cellular.

In case of inclement weather, the festival will move to Forum Hall in the K-State Student Union.

Goodbye, Gates

As CEO steps down, Microsoft will continue to thrive

YEGOR SOROKIN

When I was studying to earn my bachelor's degree, one of my friends was expelled from the university. After a couple of months, he was hired for a mysterious position that was somehow connected with computers. Nobody knew what he was doing, but I knew he was making good money. For the first time in my life, I saw a person thriving without a college degree. Like my friend, one man has famously done what many Americans view as impossible.

As reported by the BBC, Bill Gates, chairman of Microsoft Corp., is stepping down from his job running the world's largest software company. Gates is the incarnation of the American Dream – he dropped out of college and set out on his own to create one of the most successful companies ever.

All he had were his brain and his glasses (and, some people will tell you, wealthy parents). He might no longer hold the title of wealthiest man alive, but his character is certainly among the richest.

While Warren Buffet was silently investing in businesses from Omaha, Gates and Microsoft were promoted everywhere. Big bucks do attract attention and negative emotions at times, and there are a lot of controversial feelings about this man. Some people actually see him as the human personification of greed.

People can complain as much as they like, but if you don't like Gates' wealth, stop supporting him by purchasing Microsoft products and switch to Apple or free software. If you say Apple is not ready to be a Windows alternative, join the Linux community and contribute. Despite all the whining about bugs in Microsoft's software, we still use it, thus making a choice.

We, as willing consumers, make Gates rich. He isn't robbing us. No matter what you think about him, I am sure he has attained a lot of his goals. After stepping down from Microsoft, the man with only a high school diploma will be free to do what he wants.

I would guess running a huge corporation like Microsoft is not an easy task. His body, mind and soul must beg for rest. Gates will have more time for his family. He will be able to concentrate his attention on the most important people in his world rather than worrying about hundreds of employees and customers.

Leaving Microsoft is the right decision for Gates and his family. I cannot imagine, though, how a man like him can just stop working. He is used to making tough decisions and living with a packed schedule.

One of the possible options for Gates is to direct his energy and time towards charity, namely supporting the already-established Bill & Melinda Gates Foundation. This time however, it could be management insight, new ideas and CEO experience he contributes rather than money.

Will Microsoft succeed without Gates? I bet it will. According to a recent CNN.com Money report, "Revenues [for Microsoft] grew 18 percent in the just-ending June 2008 fiscal year. And net profit is up even more, rising 27 percent to a stunning $18 billion, according to the consensus of Wall Street analysts who follow the company."

Christina Klein | COLLEGIAN

Microsoft is an enormous system that does not depend on Gates anymore. I believe he designed and built it that way so he could leave it painlessly. The amount of labor Gates put into his company is so vast that it will keep Microsoft going for a fair period of time, despite the fear of eventual bad management. "The post-Gates era has actually begun already," according to the CNN.com story.

Gates has planned his departure for at least four years and Microsoft is consciously looking for talent. The company hires the best minds from the software industry for key management positions. Microsoft also searches for skilled labor for even the lowest-ranking positions not only in the U.S., but all around the world.

Let's wish Gates health and happiness and thank him for his hard work. By the way, do you know where I can buy a pair of those glasses?

Montana secession threat just childish politics as usual

JESSICA HENSLEY

"Screw you guys – I'm goin' home!"

This is the line – originally uttered by "South Park" character Eric Cartman – that comes to mind when describing the response of several dozen Montana politicians – including Montana Secretary of State Brad Johnson – to the U.S. Supreme Court ruling on the most recent court case dealing with the Second Amendment.

The cause of the Montana politicians' hissy fit, D.C. v. Heller, was ruled on Thursday. According to CNN.com, the case questioned whether or not a sweeping ban on handguns within the limits of Washington, D.C., violated the Second Amendment, which grants all Americans the right to bear arms.

According to an article in the June 2008 edition of Reason Magazine, days prior to the D.C. v. Heller case being heard by the court, Montana politicians presented a joint resolution pointing out that when the federal government approved Montana's state constitution, it included a clause which grants "any person" the right to bear arms. The federal government recognized that clause as consistent in meaning with the Second Amendment of the U.S. Constitution. The joint resolution suggested that if the Supreme Court came down on what Montana representatives viewed as the "wrong side" of D.C. v. Heller, Montana might secede from the United States.

Montana didn't become a state until 1889 and therefore missed out on the Civil War, but to threaten secession in this day and age is nothing more than a cheap ploy. It is overreaching and ultimately empty gestures like this that are becoming far too common in politics today.

Using the threat of secession in an attempt to gain leverage is similar to a 10-year-old child threatening to run away from home if he or she does not get his or her own way with parents. It is not the way national and state politicians should behave. We are people and one nation in the U.S. and we discuss our differences and negotiate solutions on common ground – "United We Stand," remember?

The Supreme Court struck down the handgun ban, 5-4, and Justice Antonin Scalia wrote the opinion for the majority. The implications of this decision for Washington, D.C., will be far-reaching; for Montana, not so much.

Having gotten their way, at least for now, Montana will remain a part of the U.S., though it seems unlikely that the threat of secession would have been explored further had the court gone the other way.

However, if this behavior is any indication of the dedication of the politicians of Montana to maintaining the peace and integrity of our nation, perhaps we would be better off without their participation in the U.S. political process. In today's political climate, we need a willingness on the part of our politicians to discuss the issues, not an adamant refusal to participate.

In years past, my cousins would drive across the state line and buy thousands of dollars worth of illegal fireworks and shoot them off for hours. I'll never forget when a bottle rocket went crazy and lit a gardening shed on fire. My aunt shrugged and said, "I've been meaning to burn that old thing down anyway."

Last year, my friends and I got an inflatable pool and invented a game we called "King Of the Pool." It was "king of the hill" with a pool. We took turns charging the person in the middle and had an excellent time. This was also the year we lit 244 firecrackers in our roommate's bedroom to wake him up from a nap.

In 2004, I traveled with the Kansas Lions Band to Detroit and Windsor, Ontario. We arrived on July 4, and since the cities are across the Detroit River from each other, we checked into our accommodations in Canada before heading back to hear an outdoor concert and see fireworks. Crossing the border three times in one day made for an interesting Fourth.

In 2003, I celebrated the Fourth of July in Europe, which might seem weird, but it was actually pretty cool. The other American students I was with tracked down some fireworks and we set them off. We didn't even get in trouble, which made it that much better.

A few years ago in Philadelphia, my family happened upon a free concert in North Philadelphia headlined by none other than Sir Elton John with performances by Rufus Wainwright and others. The unbelievable Fourth ended with the best fireworks display I have ever seen as John crooned his hit "Philadelphia Freedom."

The most vivid memory I have of the Fourth of July comes from when I was 6 or 7 years old and my older brother thought it would be a good idea to extinguish a punk on the back of my right hand. I have yet to get an explanation for that.

When I was a kid, I was in the Hutchinson, Kan., Fourth of July parade, riding in my uncle's 1959 GMC truck. Partway through the parade, the truck overheated, and we had to push it out of the parade line. It was a little embarrassing.

Intramurals play on with fewer participants

By Grant Guggisberg
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Despite having fewer participants than during the school year, K-State Recreational Services offers three different intramural sports for students living in Manhattan during the summer.

During the school year, intramural sports range from basic entries like flag football and basketball to less-traditional sports like miniature golf and inner-tube water polo. In the summer session, the three available sports are sand volleyball, softball and basketball.

"Volleyball and softball are co-rec leagues, and the basketball is men only," said Craig Kilbourn, intramural supervisor for recreational services.

A women's basketball league was available, as well as dodgeball, but there was not a high level of interest.

While intramurals are often filled with rivalries and competitiveness during the school year, the summer leagues are more about having fun.

"We put our team together through our church," said Jonathan Collum, senior in psychology. "Since it's co-rec, we need at least three girls to play."

His team had to forfeit a recent match, but played for nearly an hour just for fun. Collum said sand volleyball appealed to his team because of the short season.

"We play twice a week, so the season only lasts a couple weeks, which is convenient," he said.

The summer intramural season is a short one, with each league having five or six games, depending on the sport.

"The sand volleyball and the softball are both round-robin leagues, with each team playing each other once," said John Wondra, associate director of recreational services. "The basketball league is a double round-robin, with each team playing each other twice."

If the weather cooperates, the last intramural game this summer will be July 10. The next opportunity to sign up for intramurals will be in the fall, – more than 20 different sports will be available.

Wondra said the lack of interest in past summers has resulted in just three sports being offered.

"We used to do other individual sports, like tennis, but people weren't signing up," he said. "We also offered dodgeball this summer, but no one signed up."

Many students leave Manhattan for the summer, and that certainly affects participation numbers for summer intramural leagues. However, Wondra was unsure of exactly why summer intramurals have declined in popularity.

"I think we could be losing people to other Manhattan-area leagues," he said. "Also, I don't have any referees that were available to work this summer, so each summer sport is 'call your own,' which is less popular."

Despite the lack of interest, Wondra said he is working toward expanding the program.

"We may be picking the wrong sports, or we might need to make other changes," he said. "We want to do whatever we can to get people to come out and participate."

Concerts optional

Paul pays big money for the show and finds country fans celebrating their love of music

When thinking about Country Stampede, what comes to mind? Is it the picking of a guitar and the twang of country music stars as they sing into their microphones, or is it the thousands of country music fans singing along with their favorite stars?

For me, it's all of the above. I'm not one of those people that only go to Stampede to party: I go for the show.

While I was at Stampede this year, I watched Rodney Atkins and Josh Turner. These two had very different performance styles. Atkins was a very energetic performer who used the stage's catwalk to get the crowd involved, while Turner was more reserved and stayed on the main stage in front of his microphone.

Of those two, I think Atkins put on a better show for the venue. I enjoy watching a performer who interacts with the crowd.

For those who have never been to Stampede, the catwalk extends into the VIP seating section about thirty rows deep. People are able to congregate around it and hold up items for performers to sign.

I remember seeing Neal McCoy pick up a beer from an audience member last year and pound it on stage. I didn't witness anything like that this year, but I have no doubt it happened sometime during the weekend.

Stampede attendees respond to whatever the performer does and thus creates an ideal atmosphere to watch a concert.

People dance, sing and do downright crazy things. If you are a die-hard country fan or even just an average listener, you can appreciate the passion these concertgoers have for music.

It's funny to think that some of the most outrageous Stampeders are going to wake up Monday morning, put on a suit, go to work and sit behind a desk.

Country music is everyman's music. Everyone can relate to country, whether the song's about a lost love, a drunken night, or a boy and his dog. Country Stampede brings all kinds of people together for the love of country music.

People at Stampede interact with each other, with their cut-off shirts, sunburns and bikini tops, without knowing anything about each other other than that they love country music.

This is the second year I have been to Country Stampede, and as long as the same caliber of talent continues to come to Manhattan, I will continue to go.

It's awesome that such a large event with great talent is in our small town. These events often seem to be reserved for cities like Austin, Texas, Dallas, Denver, or even Kansas City, Mo. I would guess most of these artists didn't even know where Manhattan was until they arrived here, and I am sure they were surprised to find so many passionate country music fans gathered in one place.

This event puts Manhattan on the country music map. People continue to come back year after year to hear the music and see the show these entertainers put on.

Country Stampede is a vacation for country music fans everywhere. It's a place for these people to let loose and be who they really are at heart.

Eric ventures to the lake for the drinking and discovers Stampede cannot impede a good time

When the dust settled and the last Stampeder had left Tuttle Creek State Park, I paused to reflect on the last four days of country music.

Every year, thousands of people travel to the park from all over the country to do at least one of two things: party for four solid days or see some shows.

As I walked around observing the festival and campgrounds, I noticed there were all types of people represented at Stampede. I chatted with my friend Angela at one point in the evening about that very point.

"Give me one type of person, like a single parent with his or her child, or grandparents, and I bet we could find at least one," I said to my friend.

She agreed and we spent the next few minutes trying to think of an outrageous example of humanity. We had a good time.

As I looked from face to face, I noticed there was one factor that linked most of the patrons: sheer and utter drunkenness.

I like to drink, but I can't understand the appeal of drinking outside all day in the mud. Make no mistake, the rains over the weekend left quite a bit of mud.

I can wrap my brain around going to a four-day festival to see great concerts, but it's the fans who go for the sole purpose of drinking that I don't understand. Don't get me wrong, I love drinking with friends and listening to music, but standing in the hot sun with a glass of water in my hand is hard enough, and water doesn't dehydrate you.

People went to great lengths to avoid the mud, but there were also those who went to great lengths to get into the mud. I think my favorite mud-covered man was a gentleman who decided to completely cover himself as he enjoyed his $5 beer.

After I was done at the actual festival, I walked around the campground a bit longer to survey the damage from four days of partying.

As I walked between tents and over litter-filled mud holes, I noticed how careless many of the festival's customers had been when leaving their campsites. It seemed the late-night games of beer pong and flip cup left the campers unable to clean up their general refuse from the area before they left.

I walked around a little more and found a large group of people that seemed a little out of place at a country music festival. The owner of the truck was a man named Bill who had speakers sitting in the bed of his truck that were blasting classic rap songs.

I asked around the group to see who owned the truck and I was offered several beers, some cigarettes and one shady-looking brown cigar that Bill's friend Tony assured me was a clove cigarette. I didn't accept that particular piece of hospitality.

Bill and his friends chatted with me about Stampede and why they come every year with little to no desire to see any shows whatsoever.

"The party's out here!" Bill yelled as those in the group around him cheered loudly in agreement.

Bill went on to explain that he and his friends use the four-day weekend as an excuse to reunite and "get crunk" once a year. Bill also explained that it was difficult for a large group to get together anywhere else without "a lot of work no one wants to do."

As I bid farewell to Bill and his friends, the song "Baby Got Back" began to play and sent the group into a frenzy. Before I left, I turned around to get one more look at my newest friends and saw how much they enjoyed Stampeding without any country music.

Officials promote voter education, simple registration for students

By Whitney Hodgin
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

On Nov. 4, U.S. citizens will vote for the country's next president, and local officials recommend that students become familiar with the procedure before blindly walking into a voting booth.

Citizens must be registered to vote and can do so at more than 25 different registration posts in and around Manhattan.

Some locations are the Manhattan Chamber of Commerce, the Westloop Dillons, Manhattan High School, the Manhattan Public Library and the Manhattan Town Center.

Online registration is also an option at Web sites like www.rockthevote.com, www.declareyourself.com, or some personal Web sites.

Registration cards are available in the K-State Student Union at the Office of Student Activities and Services. The Student Governing Association also promotes voting awareness before local and national elections.

"At the [SGA] retreat, we will be working on gathering information for students on how to vote," said Amy Schultz, student senate chair and senior in biology.

Student Body President Lydia Peele said educating students on the voting process and political issues will be at the top of the SGA's to-do list at the beginning of the Fall 2008 semester.

"We will promote every side of the issues in terms of voting," Peele, senior in mathematics education, said. "We're not going to take any political stance, but we want to make sure students understand what those stances are."

According to a press release from the Kansas Secretary of State, Kansas voters are required to identify themselves at the polls with any of the following: current Kansas driver's license; current Kansas ID card; utility bill; bank statement; paycheck or paycheck stub; government check; or other official government document showing the voter's name and address.

College students have the right to vote where they attend school. However, they can also vote in the towns they grew up in, according to www.rockthevote.com.

State residents living on-campus can use their school addresses to register, which means students living in residence halls can register as easily as students living off-campus. The deadline for registering in Kansas is Oct. 20.

Many college students temporarily living away from home need to vote absentee. They should request an absentee ballot from the state of their permanent address be sent to the address they are physically planning to be at on Election Day, said Joy Mendez, Riley County election clerk.

"We promote advanced voting at the clerk's office to avoid long lines on Election Day," Mendez said. "Early voting starts Oct. 15 and ends Nov. 3."

Additional information about how to change a registered voting address and voting abroad or in the military can be found at www.rockthevote.com.

July 4th featured balloons, buggies

As another Fourth of July draws near, the Collegian would like to celebrate by offering this look at past Independence Day festivities in Manhattan. The following article comes from the 1985 Royal Purple yearbook.

Manhattan is planning a birthday celebration for America and everyone is invited.

The third-annual "Little Apple Independence Celebration" is scheduled for Thursday at the River Pond Area of Tuttle Creek State Park.

Sponsored by the Manhattan Chamber of Commerce, this year's activities include a water-ski tournament and show, arts and crafts fair, canoe races, music performances, sky-diving and hot-air balloon demonstrations and buggy rides.

The celebration will culminate with a salute to the 50 states by the Fort Riley howitzers and a fireworks display.

Tom Holder, vice president of Union National Bank and Trust Co., and chairman of the planning committee, said the event will be "a good family day."

Early arrivals to the party will see the beginning of the water-ski tournament scheduled for 7:30 a.m. K-State's Ski Club is sponsoring the event. Gary Jones, sophomore in pre-design professions and member of the club, said there will be two divisions: one for novices (skiers who are just learning to go through a slalom course) and an open division for more experienced skiers.

Each division will contain four classes: men older than 17; men younger than 17; and women older than 17; and women younger than 17.

The novice course will consist of a three-round slalom plus a two-round trick-skiing event. The skiers will get two passes per round. In the trick-skiing event they will try to do as many tricks as they can in 20 seconds. The tricks must be recognized by the American Water-Ski Association, Jones said.

The ski club will provide boats and drivers for the tournament, but skis and life jackets must be provided by the contestants. The entry fee is $15 for one event, or $20 for both the slalom and trick skiing. Jones said he will accept the first 30 paid entries.

People who would rather be in a boat than behind one can enter one of the three canoe races: the men's open, a 1,000-yard sprint; the novice, a 500-yard sprint; or the mix couples race, a 500-yard sprint.

Canoeists can register the day of the race at the River Pond area. They have a choice of bringing their own canoe or using the ones already there. The first race is at 2:30 p.m.

Non-competitors can watch water-ski races or canoe races or choose from many of the other events scheduled. The arts and crafts fair begins at 2 p.m. and ends at 8 p.m. Horse and buggy rides will begin after 3 p.m. The daring can soar in a hot air balloon.

K-State's Sky Diving Club will be jumping during the festivities. Mike Smith, junior in architecture and president of the club, said at least three sky divers will jump out of a plane at 7,500 feet, free fall for a short distance and then do a maneuver called canopy relative work (CRW). One diver maneuvers his parachute until he is directly under another diver. The diver above will then rest on the other's canopy.

The fireworks display will begin at sundown. The show is scheduled to last about 40 minutes.

Admission to the celebration is free and there is no charge for any of the spectator events.

Picnicking is in full swing this summer, and while we should remember that it's the spirit of the gathering that makes a picnic special, great food also plays an important role in the classic summertime meal.

SARAH RASMUSSEN

According to foodtimeline.org, there are multiple ways to enjoy a picnic, ranging from traditional picnics in the park to meals in a canoe with friends.

Sandwiches, chips, pie and lemonade are the most common items consumed at picnics, but there are many other items that can serve as healthier alternatives to traditional fare.

The most interesting combination I've heard of is apple slices with lime juice sprinkled over them. The lime juice helps keep the apple slices from turning brown, so they last longer.

Homemade salsa is another healthy option. When salsa is made at home from fresh ingredients, there is nothing tastier. Tortilla chips are also healthier than greasy potato chips because they won't sit too heavily in your stomach.

Pretzels are always a good choice, too, because most brands pride themselves on being low- or no-fat. When pretzels are paired with pieces of cheese, the result is both healthy and delicious.

With the rising temperatures, overeating during the summer often causes discomfort. To help combat this, simply replace parts of your meals with lighter menu items without missing out on taste. A different take on a traditional sandwich is replacing the bread with a pita.

Since pitas are less spongy than bread, they won't fill you up as much as bread does.

While full stomachs are important, hydration is the most important part of a day in the great outdoors.

If you prefer water to lemonade, then try Glacéau Smartwater because it is infused with electrolytes, so it's water with a small kick. Since plastic-bottle waste is not good for the environment, it is more ecologically friendly to invest in a water filtration system like Brita or Pür so you can refill water bottles instead of throwing them away and buying new ones.

Mess-free foods are also great for picnics because no one wants to worry about sticky fingers while basking in the sun. Try foods like dried fruit, trail mix and dried cherries with peanuts for a quick and easy clean-up.

These treats are also packed with vitamins and minerals, so they are healthy alternatives to prepackaged junk food snacks.

For more ideas on picnicking menus, visit foodtimeline.org and try some new recipes because the possibilities for your own summer feast are limitless.

Classic 4th of July fireworks advice from a true American

In preparation for our nation's birthday, we might need a refresher course on what possibly might be the most exciting part of the summer holiday – fireworks.

In the 2001 comedy "Joe Dirt," David Spade's blue-collar character, Joe, takes audiences on a cross-country adventure in search of his parents.

In one scene, Joe stops at a roadside fireworks stand in New Mexico and engages in some tongue-twisting dialogue about his favorite Fourth of July pyrotechnics with an American Indian named Kicking Wing who happens to be running the stand.

Joe Dirt: Well, I see you got them snakes 'n' sparklers, but where's the good stuff, man?

Kicking Wing: Good stuff? This is the good stuff, snakes and sparklers.

Joe Dirt: Are you nuts, dude? You need stuff that explodes, go boom.

Kicking Wing: Why is that good?

Joe Dirt: Well, why's a tree good? Why's a sunset good? Why are boobs good? Man, firecrackers, you stick 'em in mail boxes, you drop 'em in toilets. ... So you're gonna tell me that you don't have no black cats, no roman candles, or screaming mimis?

Kicking Wing: No.

Joe Dirt: Oh, come on, man. You got no lady fingers, fuzz buttles, snicker bombs, church burners, finger blasters, gut busters, zippity do-dahs, or crap flappers?

Kicking Wing: No, I don't.

Joe Dirt: You're gonna stand there, owning a fireworks stand, and tell me you don't have no whistling bungholes, no spleen spliters, whisker biscuits, honkey lighters, hoosker dos, hoosker dont's, cherry bombs, nipsy daisers – with or without the scooter stick – or one single whistling kitty chaser?

Kicking Wing: No.

Joe Dirt: Why?

Kicking Wing: Because snakes and sparklers are the only ones I like.

Joe Dirt: Well, that might be your problem. It's not what you like – it's the consumer.

Newest Pixar film aims high for lesson

"Wall•E"
★★★½☆

Movie review by Aubree Casper

Most Disney movies aim to teach kids about manners, loving their parents, not talking to strangers and the power of true love. Disney and Pixar's newest digitally animated film "Wall•E" no doubt teaches kids a few lessons, but the hyped-up summer blockbuster might just go right over their heads.

Opening last weekend with $62.5 million in sales, the robot love story reaches deep into the hearts and imaginations of children, but stimulating political motivations will keep parents thinking about the moral future of our world, too.

Seven hundred years after all the humans have left the planet they trashed to find the good life aboard the Axiom spaceship, which looks like any Celebrity Cruise Line commercial, they are ready to explore their home planet to see if it is inhabitable again. Wall•E, the heroic robot whose name stands for "Waste Allocation Load Lifter Earth-class," was left behind to continue his quest of cleaning up the remnants of previous human existence.

E.V.E., a robot sent from Axiom, finds herself exploring the area where Wall•E is compacting 700 years worth of junk. It is E.V.E.'s mission to find any vegetation which would indicate to the space-bound humans that life on Earth is possible.

Wall•E falls in love with E.V.E. immediately, and though she is slow to return the same feelings, their journey together takes them to space and back. The worst part about the film is the fact that every human on the Axiom is morbidly obese, and their lifestyles cater to such health hazards. Everyone flies around on space-age recliners, gulping meals from a cup and hanging out by pools and in beauty parlors.

Whether or not the writers of "Wall•E" intended the movie to be a political statement on the future of so-called "lazy Americans," they extend an invitation to believe that at the rate we're going, we will eventually end up leaving Earth as a big pile of trash as we slowly balloon into overweight astronauts who can no longer walk due to inactivity. In fact, the first time a human walks in the film, the title song from "2001: A Space Odyssey" plays, evoking a few snorts from adult moviegoers. Many of the images and ideas are too sophisticated to even begin to explain to children and at times could even cause some disinterest on their part.

Possible political undertones aside, Disney and Pixar clearly have another hit on their hands. With no big-name actors filling up the credits for voiceovers like many other recent children's movies, this visually stunning futuristic film is offers several laughs and more than enough "aw" moments for both the youngest and oldest viewers.

Jazz fest entertains all ages

By Aubree Casper
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The foot of a single soldier opened the 2008 Little Apple Jazz Festival as the rainy morning sky filled with sunshine.

Within seconds, the entire First Infantry Division Big Band from Fort Riley appeared on the main stage to kick off six hours of jazz performances at the Larry Norvell Band Shell in Manhattan City Park. The group, which formed in 1943 and is comprised of 18 members of the U.S. Armed Forces, has been busy spreading not only American freedom, but what festival emcee David Whitman called the only truly American art form.

Whitman, a K-State graduate with a master's degree in percussion performance, said the draw to jazz music today is the idea that it is "wholly American."

"Jazz is the only truly American art form, and to be able to celebrate it the day after we celebrate the birth of our nation is incredible," he said.

Whitman, who served as host of the event last year as well, said the most gratifying part of the day is watching people enjoy jazz.

"It's great to be around jazz and see the work [of the event's planners] come to fruition," Whitman said.

Following the First Infantry Division's Big Band performance, the High School Jazz All-Stars took to a second stage, followed by a main stage performance from El Mambo Orquestra, a Kansas City jazz ensemble that blended jazz, mambo, cha-cha and reggae together for a set that quickly had audience members dancing along.

The Kelly McCarty Trio, which featured an eight-string guitar, saxophone and drum, was headed by K-State graduate Kelly McCarty and provided an easy-listening modern jazz instrumental bridge from the rhythmic sounds of each performance.

As the sun began to set on the park, The New Red Onion Jazz Babies took the main stage and caught the audience by surprise, delivering an energetic and humorous glimpse into the thriving world of classic Dixieland jazz.

Armed with a banjo, keyboard, trombone, tenor horn, tuba, drums, cornet and clarinet, the seven-piece jazz group kept hundreds of festival attendees laughing with stories, jokes and humorous songs.

By the time this year's festival headliner, The Lisa Henry Jazz Group, began a quick sound check, the audience had grown considerably in anticipation for the nationally recognized singer and her band.

While many jazz groups dot America's musical landscape, Beth Bailey, media relations director for Union Program Council, said that after seeing the group perform at the Smoky Hill River Festival in Salina last year, she knew The Lisa Henry Jazz Group was just right for the Manhattan festival.

Whitman said jazz is based on improvisation and Henry emphasized that point by introducing her band through a song that relied on immediate audience interaction.

This was the eighth year the Manhattan Parks and Recreation Department and UPC worked together to bring jazz artists from across the region to Manhattan residents.

Bailey said the festival has moved from Colbert Hills to Bosco Student Plaza before landing at the Larry Norvell Band Shell in City Park. After extensive planning with a committee of K-State students and faculty, as well as Manhattan community members, six jazz groups were selected to play at this year's event.

One of those committee members was Courtney Smith, junior in marketing and UPC summer programs co-chair.

It will be up to Smith and co-chair Jennifer Heiman to decide the future of UPC's involvement in the Little Apple Jazz Festival.

Smith said she hopes to continue UPC's relationship with Parks and Recreation into next summer and sees potential for an equally sucessful event next summer, in addition to bringing more events like the festival to campus for students during the slower summer months.

Audience members from all generations experienced "Jazz at the Core," this year's theme, and the performers proved that jazz is, as Whitman said, an American art form that anyone can enjoy.

Asbestos concerns on campus minor

By Jenna Scavuzzo
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The temporary closure of Cardwell Hall two weeks ago to check for asbestos was just the third case of preventative measures taken against the cancer-causing substance this summer.

Steve Broccolo, emergency management coordinator, said workers in the building on June 24 wanted to check for tornado damage by turning on the air-handling unit and noticed some white specks that could be possible asbestos. He said while most of the spots turned out to be styrofoam on the ceiling, some were asbestos particles. He shut Cardwell down for two days to determine if the air in the building was contaminated, and an air quality test came back negative.

"The asbestos has been in the ceiling for years, but I wanted to make sure that even the little pieces that were exposed wouldn't affect anyone around," Broccolo said. "I shut it down and did an air sample as a precaution to make sure the air was clean, which it was. I opened

Leon DeMarcus Patton, junior running back for the K-State football team, was arrested early Monday morning for theft, failure to appear and driving with a canceled or suspended license, according to a Riley County Police Department report.

LEON PATTON

RCPD Lt. Kurt Moldrup said Patton was pulled over at 2:14 a.m. Monday for a traffic violation when it was discovered he had a warrant for his arrest in Pottawatomie County for theft. That incident took place on Nov. 30, 2007.

Patton was also arrested for failure to appear for charges stemming from an unpaid parking ticket. Bond was set at $1,545.

Patton was released after posting bond and is suspended from the team indefinitely, according to the Manhattan Mercury. He had been a projected starter during spring practice.

Campus bike safety

Summer is a great time to get a bicycle and save on some gas money while helping the environment. Just keep these tips in mind when you start showing off your new wheels:

- Register your bike with Parking Services. It's free — and you'll get parking tickets if you don't.
- Record the serial number of your bike.
- Use sturdy U-Locks or heavy, case-hardened chains to lock your bike.
- Lock your bike on a bike rack. Most stolen bikes are never even locked up.
- If you're really concerned about theft, carry your front wheel with you after you park your bike.
- While you're at it, take your accessories, like gel-padded seats and storage bags.
- Stay off the sidewalks — use bike lanes instead.
- Be sure your bike has a front light and reflectors to meet the state law.

In case of a car accident

If you're in an automobile accident, whether it's a fender bender or more serious crash, remember these basic steps to ensure the safety of you and your passengers:

1. Stay at the scene: Do not leave the scene of an accident until the police have arrived and told you that you are free to go.

2. Safeguard the injured: Call the police immediately and tell them how many people are injured so they can send appropriate emergency help. Never try to move an injured person without a medical professional's help.

3. Obtain information: Get the other driver's name, insurance information and contact numbers. Also, get the names and contact information of any witnesses and police who assist you. It might help to take notes about the accident while it's fresh in your mind, for court purposes.

4. Do not admit fault: Contact a lawyer before making a statement.

5. Seek medical care: If you are injured, even slightly, go see a doctor immediately, or it could hurt your case if you have to go to court for any reason.

Wildcats to represent the U.S. in track and field at Olympic Games

By Jessica Hensley
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Former Wildcat middle distance runner Christian Smith and current K-State assistant track and field coach Tom Pappas qualified for the 2008 Olympic Games June 30 at the U.S. Olympic Trials at the University of Oregon in Eugene.

TOM PAPPAS

Smith, the 2006 NCAA indoor mile champion, qualified for his first Olympic Games when he narrowly beat prohibitive race favorite and 2004 Olympian Khadevis Robinson to finish third in the men's 800 meters.

The final lunge towards the finish line, as each runner tried to lean over the line to secure the final U.S. spot for the event, left both sprawled on the track.

"I wasn't even sure if I was third or fourth," Smith said in a recent interview. "I didn't want to face the possibility of coming so close and not making the team, so I laid there on my stomach for about 15 seconds."

He got his answer less than a minute later when the times were posted on the scoreboard.

Smith defeated Robinson by a margin of .06 seconds and qualified to represent the U.S. in Beijing with a time of 1:45.47. Smith, a Garfield, Kan., native and Pawnee Heights High School graduate, finished behind Nicholas Symmonds, who won the event with a time of 1:44.10, and Andrew Wheating, who finished in 1:45.03.

Earlier that day, Wildcat assistant coach Tom Pappas qualified for his third Olympic Games with a third-place finish in the decathlon. He finished this year's trials with a two-day total of 8,511 points, and will join winner Bryan Clay (8,832) and second-place finisher Trey Hardee (8,534) on the U.S. team.

The five-time U.S. outdoor champion finished fifth in the 2000 Olympic decathlon with a total of 8,425 points. The University of Tennessee graduate was favored to win the event in 2004 after winning the 2003 world championship, but was unable to finish due to a foot injury sustained during his first pole-vault attempt of the games.

Pappas' personal best in the decathlon came when he won the USA Outdoor Championships in 2003 with a total of 8,784 points, setting a meet record.

After arriving in China in early August, Smith will run in the first round of the 800 meters on August 20 and Pappas will begin decathlon competition the next day.

TO THE POINT

Changes can save students cash and gas

No one thought it would get this bad, but here it is: we're finally paying $4 for a single gallon of gas. Unimaginably high gas prices have been threatened by Chicken Little reporters for the last five years, but this time our fears have finally been realized.

TO THE POINT is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

While we cannot do much to lower gas prices right now, there are a few ways for college students to cut back. That way, we can save ourselves from making another heartbreaking call to our parents to tell them we aren't going to make it home again because we cannot afford the gas.

First, it would be convenient if Parking Services would continue running the shuttle from the Peters Recreation Complex and KSU Foundation Center to the K-State Student Union. The parking garage isn't finished, and most of the students who used the shuttle during the school year are still in town and would continue to use it over the summer.

For students, we recommend tuning up that old bike and riding it everywhere possible. Two wheels are the best way to get around these days, and for $60-$70, you can buy a decent bike for the cost of a single fill-up at the gas station.

You hear it all the time, but riding a bike truly is great exercise that gives you more time to get to class and takes some stress out of your day.

Though buying a new car just to get better gas mileage might not be in most college students' budgets, we encourage those who are looking to consider a hybrid car. With no end in sight to the energy crisis, these innovative vehicles are starting to look like the true future of the automobile.

Starbucks store closings hurt employees, reveal need for better corporate planning

YEGOR SOROKIN

Starbucks, that controversial coffee shop of almost mythical proportions, recently announced plans to shut 500 U.S. stores in addition to the 100 closures it had announced previously, according to the BBC.

For the first time since its establishment in 1971, Starbucks has slowed the rate of its U.S. expansion.

While I do not see the current downturn in the U.S. economy as the only reason for this, I think the U.S. market is saturated with coffee shops and Starbucks stores in particular. Though shutting down 500 stores in the U.S. might be a sign of the end of Starbucks growth at home, the chain's management is smart enough to recognize development opportunities abroad.

What looks like a shrinking corporation in America will still prosper in the near future.

At another level, however, this cut is more than a reduction in physical coffee shops. According to CBS News, "about 12,000 workers will be affected by the closings [in the United States]." Though a Starbucks spokeswoman said most employees will be moved to stores near the closing ones, I really doubt that a significant number of these jobs will be saved.

Don't get me wrong – layoffs are inevitable. The problem is that Starbucks did not foresee this saturation of the U.S. market, and now it has to pay the price as both employees and the company lose.

Workers lose jobs, and "related charges will add up to $328 million to $348 million" for Starbucks Corporation, according to CBS News.

Additionally, the corporation will feel the negative implications of a low, long-term corporate credit rating, according to Fox News.

Thinking about the future of those 12,000 employees pushed me to research the current state of affairs for Starbucks baristas.

Though the company Web site claims that Starbucks is still in the Forture 100 list of the best companies to work for, the Starbucks Workers Union Web site indicates serious problems in the corporate employment policies – most notably, low wages and a lack of benefits.

I would consider a barista position to be a job without a future; there aren't many options for professional growth there. The best one could hope for might be becoming a manager, and this job will require a different set of skills than just brewing coffee.

Working at Starbucks usually provides a temporary job for people who are in school or between more permanent jobs. Some people might consider such a job to be a lifelong path and expect increases in salary, but expecting that from Starbucks probably is not a good idea.

The friction between the employees' union and Starbucks Corp. stems from the fact that the two sides have different ideas for what constitutes "decent pay" for a barista. I think any company should willingly emphasize possibilities at a workplace: employees either grow in a position with potential or consciously settle down with a job which is temporary by nature.

In that case, workers are looking for another constant job from the very beginning. Once the company recognizes employees are simply in transitory positions and then begins supporting and preparing them for leaving, managing turnover will be much easier and the quality of work will probably increase.

Even if I ultimately plan to leave a job, if I feel a company cares about me, I'll have incentive to return the favor by providing good service for customers.

The bottom line is better service, more customers and fewer closings. Had Starbucks acted that way from the very beginning, conflict between the union and the corporation would be much less sharp.

Starbucks will still do very well internationally. The goods and services of Starbucks are overpriced and will remain so, and though many Americans are not as willing to spend that money at Starbucks as before, consumers worldwide will.

In a recent K-State podcast titled "Tips on Retiring Comfortably," Fred Brock, assistant professor of journalism and mass communications, recalled several years ago a cup of coffee at Starbucks cost about 25 cents – now it is more than $3.

While inhabitants of North America and Europe will not find anything unique in a Starbucks chain, Asian and Latin American customers might think of the company's coffee shops as a sip of the American way of life.

Starbucks must now rely on impressing international customers to keep its empire afloat. Hopefully, the employment demands of international employees will help counter the current negative feelings of American workers.

Dreams of abundance, security still not realized for many Americans

JESSICA HENSLEY

Though we might not want to admit it, poverty is still on the rise in our land of opportunity.

The United States Census Bureau defines the povery line as an income $10,587 or less annually for an individual, or $16,537 or less annually for a family of three. According to the bureau, 4.4 million more people are living in these conditions in the United States now than were in 2000.

American families are faring much worse than they have in past decades. In 2004, 7.6 million American families – 10 percent of all U.S. families – lived in poverty, a huge jump from 2000.

As if that wasn't bad enough, a recent survey conducted by the Bureau of Labor Statistics revealed 11.2 percent of American households now struggle to feed themselves each day.

This should be unacceptable in one of the richest countries on Earth.

Our nation is undeniably one of the most powerful to ever exist and we are still the only true superpower, yet so many of our citizens struggle to obtain the most basic necessities of food, shelter and clothing.

While some might argue it is the American way to allow individuals to fail or triumph based upon personal achievement and perseverance, we must ask ourselves: Is it not also America's promise to look after those who live here?

Welfare programs and the minimum wage have been debated ad nauseum by politicians, pundits and television personalities, but no matter their position on these issues, surely we can all agree that the system is broken.

When the minimum wage is no longer a living wage, the system needs to be repaired. When millions of people in our hometowns are unable to feed themselves, something is wrong.

We as a society must agree to look for a solution. It most certainly will not be as easy as we might hope, but it is our responsibility as humans to care for those who are unable to care for themselves.

We can start small with something as simple as making a donation to a local food bank, something which we cannot do enough.

According to CNN.com, Northwest Harvest, an organization that provides food to about 300 food banks, reported that donations are down almost 40 percent.

It may be difficult in this time of rising gas and food prices and this time of war – when both danger and hardship seem to be all around us – to think of responsibility to others, but we must.

It is the mark of our society that we strive to make things better for the next generation, and it is the promise of our nation that we will make things better for our fellow Americans.

TORNADO RECOVERY

Sigma Alpha Epsilon continues reconstruction

Nathaniel LaRue | COLLEGIAN

Marshall Van Tuyl, Sigma Alpha Epsilon head recruitment chair, demonstrates Monday afternoon what repairs and renovations are being done to the SAE house over the summer months. Van Tuyl said that while the chapter was already planning minor renovations, the plans had to be extended because of damage done by the June 11 tornado.

By Brad Dornes
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Reconstruction to the Sigma Alpha Epsilon fraternity house will continue throughout the summer and should be completed by the beginning of the fall semester, said Scott Jones, director of Greek Affairs.

"We are working to make sure that all potential students know that they will have a place to stay that is safe and comfortable," Jones said. "The construction will be completed before the school year starts."

Jones said that if for some reason the reconstruction is not complete by the beginning of the school year, Greek Affairs will work with the university to find alternative living arrangements for displaced students.

Immediately after the tornado, fraternity members started picking up debris inside the house, said Brady Ott, SAE president.

"Our members have really stepped up and helped clean up after this disaster," Ott, senior in architectural engineering, said, "which has allowed the reconstruction process to continue as smoothly as possible."

Summer recruitment has also been unaffected by the destruction, Ott said.

"Everyone has been really understanding of the construction," he said. "Many new members and recruits have even offered to help, which says a lot about them."

Marshall Van Tuyl, senior in architectural engineering and SAE head recruitment chair, said that the tornado has been a blessing in disguise.

"We are using this time to not only reconstruct the fraternity but to also renovate it as well," Van Tuyl said. "By the time it is back to 100 percent, it will be better than ever."

The recent rains in Manhattan have not pushed back the timeline for completion of work on the house, Van Tuyl said.

Ott said that one of the main reasons the reconstruction will be done before school starts in August is volunteers offering their time and effort to help put the fraternity back together.

"I would like to thank everyone in Manhattan, K-State students, alumni and faculty for all the support that we have received," Ott said. "Everyone has been tremendously supportive."

Camp promotes sciences to 66 high-school girls

By Whitney Hodgin
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Sixty-six high-school girls interested in careers in science, technology, engineering or mathematics are learning and gaining confidence by getting involved in a K-State camp this week.

EXCITE!, which stands for EXploring sCIence, Technology & Engineering, is a program for ninth- and tenth-grade girls, said Samantha Marin, junior in industrial engineering and one of three lead mentors for the program. The four-day program is sponsored by K-State Women in Engineering and Science, Targeted Excellence Programs and other industry partners.

Girls choose to focus on one of several tracks during the program, including "Computer Game Design," "Designing Spaces," "Robotics," "Biofuels," "24 Carat EXCITEment," and "Take Flight," as well as physics, chemistry, and electricity labs. Campers have 24 mentors and staff members, many of whom are women, to guide them through the week, according to k-state.edu/excite.

"It's fun to show them a different side of engineering and science that is related to them," said Megan Plum, an EXCITE mentor and K-State graduate. "A lot of girls are scared of math and science, so we try to make it as fun as possible."

At one table in the chemical engineering lab, Jack Plummer, junior in electrical engineering, demonstrated to campers how liquid nitrogen can cause physical changes in materials.

"My favorite part was when they dipped a full-stemmed rose in liquid nitrogen and then dropped it on the ground," said Kristen Graham, a freshman at Junction City High School and EXCITE! attendee. "It shattered like glass."

Graham was previously a camper at GROW (Girls Researching Our World), a similar program for seventh- and eighth-grade girls, and signed up for EXCITE! when she became old enough for it.

Plummer, who is also assisting graduate students in the chemical engineering department over the summer, said being a lab leader is good experience.

"I work with a lot of women, so I don't see much of a gender difference," he said.

New Colbert Hills clubhouse will enhance course

By Brad Dornes
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Colbert Hills Golf Course is building a new clubhouse to further boost its reputation. The groundbreaking ceremony will take place at Colbert Hills 11 a.m. Thursday, with construction scheduled to begin Aug. 1.

Scheduled speakers at the ceremony include professional golfer Jim Colbert, member of the PGA Champions Tour and K-State graduate; Bob Krause, vice president for institutional advancement and director of athletics at K-State; and Howard Sherwood, board president of the K-State Golf Course Management and Research Foundation.

David Gourley, Colbert Hills general manager, said that the new clubhouse will be a permanent home for the course's golfers.

"The clubhouse will allow us to offer our visitors the chance to eat and visit our memorabilia and trophies," he said. "People will come from all over just to see the memorabilia."

The new clubhouse will include locker rooms, a pro shop, a multipurpose area, a conference room and a bar and grill within its estimated 13,500 square feet. It will also include a 3,000-square-feet covered patio and administrative offices.

"The building is estimated to cost around $5 million and it should be completed in 10-12 months," Gourley said.

Construction will be funded entirely by private donations. Bernard Haney, executive director of the K-State Golf Course Management and Research Foundation, said tthe new clubhouse would attract even more golfers. Currently, about 28,000 rounds of golf are played at the course each year.

"The new clubhouse will be built west of the tee box on the first hole," Haney said. "This location will provide tremendous views of Manhattan."

The 18-hole golf course, which was designed by Jim Colbert and Jeff Brauer, opened eight years ago on 315 acres. It is home to the K-State men's and women's golf teams and is also used by students in the golf-course management program.

Jim Norris, K-State men's golf coach, said the new clubhouse will make the golfing experience at Colbert Hills much more memorable.

"[The clubhouse] will make the golf course that even more attractive," Norris said. "There won't be too many golf courses that will be able to compare to Colbert Hills."

Matt Binter | COLLEGIAN

Colbert Hills Golf Course will break ground Thursday on a new clubhouse to replace the current temporary structure.

Summer is a great time to bring nature indoors, in the form of fresh flowers, open windows and fruity fragrances. But if you're worried about burning down your house with a lit candle or just tired of using the same old plug-in air freshener, try some of these alternative methods to scenting your indoor habitat.

REED DIFFUSERS

Reed diffusers are a fresh, safe alternative to candles and oil burners because they do not have an open flame, said Julie Haynes, co-owner of The Palace boutique in Aggieville.

A diffuser is a form of aromatherapy that uses fragrance oil to soothe and rejuvenate a tired, stressed mind. Diffuser reeds are placed in a jar filled with scented oil, and as the reeds soak up the oil, the fragrance permeates the room. The smell is not overly strong, nor does it spread too far, and smaller diffusers are perfect for freshening up a small bedroom or bathroom in a subtle way. They also come in fun colors and elegant glass bottles, adding a touch of class to any setting.

The Palace features several styles and sizes of reed diffusers, with scents like "honeysuckle," "vanilla bean" and even "milk." Haynes said the reeds never need to be replaced unless they break, but the oil will need to be refilled; it can last from one month to a year, depending on the quality of the diffuser. The Palace sells refills of certain scents for $29.

INCENSE STICKS, CONES

Incense is one of the cheapest ways to fill your home with fun scents this summer. Rockstar and Rogers – a clothing, costume and home decor shop in Aggieville – carries several lines of incense, ranging from the simplest single sticks and wooden holders, to packs of 40 sticks and more elaborate coffin-box holders with lids and storage space for the incense.

Rebecca Craig, co-owner of Rockstar and Rogers, said one of the store's most popular incenses is "nag champa."

"It's your basic incense," she said. "It has a more subtle, musky smell that a lot of men like. It's a classic scent without being too heavy."

Craig said other popular summer scents are "peace of mind," "Egyptian cotton" and "ocean wind."

If you are interested in incense, but are limited on the amount of space you have or do not like the messy ashes that incense holders generate, Rockstar and Rogers also carries incense cones. These are condensed versions of incense sticks that create less mess, and Craig said customers can fill a Ziploc bag with 10 cones for $1.75. The store also carries a variety of holders for incense cones, ranging from small, wooden dishes to taller gold, bronze and silver metal holders.

AROMAFLORIA POTPOURRI BEADS

These tiny, fragrant beads are not your average potpourri. For $5 a scoop – which is about a handful – you can fill an organza drawstring bag with colorful, mess-free summer scents like "pomegranate," "white sand" and "narcissus."

Lilacs on the Prairie Boutique and Gallery on Poyntz Avenue is the only vendor in Manhattan that carries the potpourri beads, according to the store's owner, Marty Wellington. She said the beads are popular with customers of all ages and she is constantly having to refill the large, glass jars that hold the beads.

"They're great because they don't leave any residue," Wellington said. "They're air activated and they don't leave a mess because the fragrance is infused into the beads, so there's no oil or stains or anything left to clean up."

Wellington said that because the beads are air-activated, their fragrance is strongest when they're more exposed to air, like in a dish on a bathroom counter. She also said heat often augments the beads' scents, which last for several months, depending on the environment they are in. Also, each scoop is enhanced by glitter, paper cutouts or botanical potpourri to make it stand out.

"A lot of people hang the bags from their rearview mirror in their car or stick one in their underwear or sock drawer," Wellington said. "The colors and smells are great for summertime."

'Hancock' fights superhero clichés with gusto but runs out of steam early

COURTESY PHOTO

"Hancock"
★★★½☆
Movie review by Brendan Praeger

The script for "Hancock" has been floating around Hollywood for more than 10 years, and the abundance of superhero movies at the cinema this year makes this the perfect time to unleash it on summer movie fans.

John Hancock (Will Smith), like most comic-book-style heroes, has superpowers. He has incredible strength, the ability to fly, invincibility and immortality. Unfortunately, he also has amnesia, alcoholism and a grudge against humanity.

The first third of the movie shows Hancock fighting crime and saving lives by destroying property and angering the citizens of Los Angeles. In short, he's the world's least-popular superhero.

After being saved by Hancock, Ray Embrey (Jason Bateman), who is described as "the Bono of public relations," decides to help Hancock change his image.

Watching Smith rebel against the iconic superhero stereotype is great fun, and "Hancock" certainly peaks early. As Hancock battles his personal demons and learns some secrets about his past, the movie falls in line with the same clichés it fought against at the beginning.

Director Peter Berg made "The Rundown" an excellent popcorn flick, but he stumbled slightly with "The Kingdom." He seemed to struggle when trying too hard to wedge a message into an otherwise frivolous action movie.

"Hancock" displays the same weakness, but to a lesser extent. The movie never becomes bad – it just loses steam. As Hancock learns more about his past, his character becomes just like every other superhero at the multiplex.

The mediocre plot is boosted significantly by entertaining performances and beautiful cinematography. Smith could make an infomercial entertaining and Bateman and Charlize Theron round out a relatively small list of big-name actors.

As a summer blockbuster, "Hancock" lands most of the punches it throws, and its flaws do little to drag down an overall enjoyable movie. It doesn't dethrone "Iron Man" as the best superhero movie of the summer, but so far, it sits significantly ahead of the rest of the crop.

Quintessential summer activities provide time to slow down, relax

The Fourth of July marks the halfway point of the summer and unfortunately, that means the time for fun and relaxation will be the time for books and studying again before we know it.

There are several activities I try to do every summer, but as I grow older, my time seems to be cluttered with responsibilities and jobs I must finish before I have fun.

First, I usually try to get a tan on my pale, boyish frame. This usually results in my body turning bright red from too much sun and not enough sunblock.

The next item on my summer list of activities is attending a Kansas City Royals baseball game. I know it is never fun to watch a division's last-place team, but the atmosphere and food always make this trip worthwhile.

Also, the Royals have been in the cellar of the American League Central for so long that their cellar dwelling should not bother anyone anymore.

I also try to squeeze in a classic road trip every summer. Gather some friends or that special someone, then pick a direction and just go. Don't set a destination or have a plan – just drive wherever the pavement takes you. Heading out onto the open road liberates the soul even as soaring gas prices empty the wallet. With careful planning and sharing of costs, money should not deter you from taking a fantastic voyage, since the memories made will always be priceless.

The last activity I try to accomplish every year is going camping, whether for a day or a weekend. The point of this is to get away from everything: no cell phones, no computers, and above all, no worries or responsibilities.

A camping trip is easy to plan and extremely affordable. All it takes is a tent, a lantern, a sleeping bag and some matches to light a fire. There is no greater feeling than catching your own fish or cooking your own meal over an open flame, and I defy anyone to find a better dessert then a s'more that has been cooked over a campfire.

Nighttime at the campsite consists of stories around the fire and assorted misadventures. In this low-stress atmosphere, it becomes easy to let the nature serenade you as you slip into a peaceful slumber under the stars.

Before summer slips away, I want to encourage everyone to get out of the house, put the TV remote down and step away from the computer. Go get some fresh air, enjoy the last remaining days of summer and don't forget the toilet paper.

MANHATTAN'S GOOD NEIGHBOR TASK FORCE

New student coordinator uses background, interests to prepare for duties

By Hannah Blick
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Sebastian O'Connor said he has always wanted to get involved in community outreach in Manhattan, and he's starting in a big way.

O'Connor, junior in political science, was recently named the new student coordinator for Manhattan's Good Neighbor Task Force for the 2008-09 school year. He said he first heard about the opportunity to apply for the position through an e-mail listserv.

"It sounded like just a great way to really get involved," O'Connor said. "So I responded, and one week later, I had an interview."

Brian Williams, Manhattan management assistant and city liaison for the task force, said he, along with Student Body President Lydia Peele and 2007-08 student coordinator Moriah Wagner, served on the selection committee for the new student coordinator.

"We had several well-qualified applicants," Williams said. "But Sebastian just seemed to be the best fit – he had an innate understanding of what we're trying to accomplish."

OTHER RESPONSIBILITIES

Though O'Connor applied for the student coordinator position to become more active in the Manhattan community, he is hardly an uninvolved student. A member of Smith Scholarship House, he served as its community service chair last school year, and will be serving as president of the house during the upcoming school year.

O'Connor was raised in Europe, where his parents were missionaries, and he said he feels that growing up in foreign countries helped him develop a deep respect for different cultures, religion and people.

"I enjoy learning about cultures, and I think this will help me in the student coordinator position," O'Connor said. "Europeans are so much more tidy, and I think we can learn from their example."

Because so many of Manhattan's residents are young or living in a temporary home, O'Connor said neighborhood problems often seem to occur when college students forget to be respectful toward their fellow community members. He suggested keeping yards clean and trim and offering services to elderly or disabled people as simple and effective gestures. O'Connor said he has gotten to know several of his neighbors in Manhattan and enjoys visiting them and getting to know their families.

"Just get to know your neighbor," he said. "It can be as simple as that."

BIG PLANS

O'Connor said though he is a bit nervous about carrying out his duties as the new student coordinator for the task force, he is looking forward to implementing some new events and raising more community awareness with

Manhattan's Good Neighbor Task Force creates community-oriented goals, ideas

By Hannah Blick
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The goal of Manhattan's Good Neighbor Task Force is to create a better, safer and more interconnected community, according to Brian Williams, Manhattan management assistant and task force liaison.

Williams said the task force is a joint project between K-State's Student Governing Association and the City of Manhattan and was created in October 2006 to help strengthen relationships between temporary residents of Manhattan, like college students, and more permanent residents, like families and senior citizens.

"We want students to get to know the community and to respect their neighbors," Williams said. "A lot of times people just forget that there's a family with kids living next door. There are more than just college students living in Manhattan."

To help combat the issues that often arise between temporary and permanent residents, the task force also aims to educate both college students and Manhattan community members on basic city rules and regulations, said Lauren Palmer, assistant city manager.

"We want citizens to respect each other and be good neighbors," Palmer said. "Even just being respectful of noise levels and adhering to city ordinances helps. We want them to be aware of each other."

Lydia Peele, student body president and senior in mathematics education, said she has been serving on the task force as an SGA representative.

Peele said the task force sponsors events like a couch and mattress amnesty day, when students and community members can bring their old furniture to a drop-off point to be either reused or disposed of properly, rather than discarding them in alleys and front yards.

The task force is planning to kick off the school year with an ice cream social and possibly some neighborhood cleanup days, she said.

Peele said the city has been very cooperative in funding the task force.

K-State and Manhattan have an agreement in which the money generated from tax dollars on campus are deposited into a special fund for the task force to use, she said.

"We use the money for the building back up after the test came back negative and classes resumed."

Broccolo said he checks for possible asbestos exposure whenever a complaint is filed by a specific building. He said the material was also found in Leasure Hall on May 23 and Kedzie Hall on June 10. He said though there have been multiple asbestos concerns on campus this summer, all of the cases have been minor.

"Most of the buildings on campus have asbestos in their ceilings," he said. "Leasure was probably my biggest concern this summer, but that case was very minor, too. If someone's worried about exposure, we go to that building and take air samples to determine if it's safe or not. We deal with it on a case-by-case basis."

Broccolo said it is difficult to predict future asbestos exposure, and there is not much possible action to be taken to prevent asbestos from showing up in the future.

"It's hard to say when more asbestos could be exposed," he said. "Someone could hit a ball on the ceiling one day and expose it, but we can't really predict when that would be."

Broccolo said if people breathe in asbestos for a while, its fibers can penetrate their systems and cause long-term effects. He said the naturally occurring material can cause cancer, and it may take 20 to 30 years until those exposed to it feel any harmful effects.

Broccolo said no illnesses have been reported on campus because of asbestos this summer. He said he has not received any recent complaints of visible asbestos and thinks all of the buildings are now safe.

advertising and word of mouth.

"I've been talking with Moriah, and I can really see she is passionate about this," he said. "I want to make sure I do a good job and build on what she has done."

Williams explained that the student coordinator's responsibilities include arranging meetings for the task force, which has about 12 core members, and overseeing task force events like the mattress and couch amnesty day and neighborhood cleanups.

O'Connor said he would like to see more sustainability programs around Manhattan and more door-to-door promotions for involvement in the task force. He said there are currently three different area neighborhoods that are partners with the task force and he would like to push for more neighborhoods to become partners.

"These residents tolerate us – we should get out there and actively serve," O'Connor said. "Students can get involved and take ownership. That usually makes everyone feel more a part of the community."

TASK FORCE | More awareness is key things like marketing the task force, providing food for volunteers, buying rakes for neighborhood cleanups," Peele said.

Student Body Vice President Robert Swift has also served on the task force as an SGA liaison and said he hopes to raise awareness about it.

"Four to five years from now, we just want everyone to know our name," Swift, senior in political science, said. "Like 'Up 'til Dawn:' everyone knows what that is."

EXCITE | Campers now students

"I'd say there is an even number of men and women in my department."

This is fantastic news for EXCITE!, which encourages girls to stay involved in the sciences throughout their schooling, said Susan Arnold Christian, outreach program coordinator for EXCITE!

"This is the first year that we've started seeing girls come back to volunteer who went to GROW and EXCITE! and are now K-State students," Arnold Christian said. "I think we need to teach young girls that they can make an impact in people's lives with science and engineering, and not just by going into [what we call] the 'helping fields' like medicine and teaching."

A DAY ON THE KANSAS RIVER

Canoe expedition

A COURAGEOUS GROUP OF K-STATE STUDENTS AND TWO ALUMNI TOOK PART IN A DARING TWO-DAY EXPEDITION DOWN THE MIGHTY AND ALWAYS UNPREDICTABLE KANSAS RIVER. THIS IS THEIR STORY.

Carly Wagner, senior in Spanish education, enjoys the sunset after traversing the Kansas River by canoe.

Day 1

ERIC DAVIS

MORNING:

The day began as well as any expedition can. I had a goal to be on the water by noon, and we were headed from Manhattan to Wamego by 11:15 a.m. The first, and hopefully last, setback occurred this morning when Mother Nature decided to let a little bit of rain fall. Luckily, the crew stayed calm, cool and collected and we were safely in our tent in no time. We sat discussing the rest of the trip and enjoying fine malt beverages while the worst of the rain fell on our tent. When the rain passed, we made short work of cleaning our temporary island shelter and were back on the water quickly.

First mate Adam Ingersoll, senior in biology, enjoys a chilled malt beverage while waiting for the storm to pass.

Doug Ingersoll, sophomore in mechanical and nuclear engineering, attempts to climb the muddy cliff after docking one of the canoes.

AFTERNOON:

The sun finally came out later and it felt good to have it on our backs again. We decided to form a catamaran with our two canoes. By connecting the boats with a plank, we gained an extra surface for supplies, as well as a stabilizing force. We stopped at a small piece of shore with muddy banks for a quick rest. One of the crew found some interesting plant life at the top of a cliff and we all climbed the summit to investigate.

Members of the crew relax around a warm fire after a long day on the water.

EVENING:

We took to the river once again until we passed St. George, Kan. We found a deserted island and set up camp for the night. We had plenty of food, so the only issue was finding wood for the fire.

We quickly began to gather wood but soon realized it was all slightly damp. I feared the state of the wood would make it unsuitable for burning, but we had two Eagle Scouts in the group who got the fire going after considerable effort.

After the fire burned down a bit, we moved some hot coals to the side to cook our bratwursts. With our bellies full of brats and beer, the night ended with a small fireworks display courtesy of our Scouts.

For more info on how to set up your own canoe trip, check out our Web site at www.kstatecollegian.com.

Day 2

Ryan Fritz, Manhattan resident, sleeps peacefully as the sun rises on our secret island campsite. The flies were bothersome overnight, but the crew solved the problem by putting towels over exposed skin.

MORNING:

The night was uneventful. Some in the group opted to sleep out by the fire, but I elected for the shelter of my tent. Those who slept outside did complain the flies were slightly unmanageable, but otherwise the insects did not bother us.

We started a little late this morning but since we got off to such a wonderful start yesterday, we had some time to lose.

We did considerably less paddling today and instead elected to let the river's current carry us downstream.

MIDDAY:

When we stopped for lunch, we did a bit more exploring. About half of us went for a swim while the other half filled the break with other activities.

We hit a bit of a snag with our canoe. There was a spot where the river was not as shallow as we thought and it took six of us to pull the vessel though the shallows. It was hard, but with some teamwork and sweat, we all made it through a little stronger.

Chris Pearson, Kansas City resident, and Davis scale the cliff. They quickly found out that climbing to the top was harder than it looks.

THE END:

As the trip drew to an end, we saw other people on the river for the first time. There was some concern that the travelers in the motorized boats wouldn't be friendly but all those concerns melted away when the captain of the second vessel saluted us with a beer in his hand.

All too soon, we reached the end of the journey. All in all, it was an excellent adventure.

The group works together to pull the catamaran out of the water. This is when we discovered the City of Wamego provides a boat ramp for seafaring travelers.

You've seen Sunset Zoological Park, Wamego and the party at Country Stampede. Now we want to hear what you, the reader, would like to see us cover. Clay play

Introductory ceramics class challenges art students with rewards, frustration

By Whitney Hodgin
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

In West Stadium, there is a dusty, black hole of a classroom that sucks in 12 students every school day for six hours. In it, they score, they slip, they throw and beat hunks of clay into submission with rolling pins, forks, wooden spoons and scissors, all for the sake of earning a passing grade on a teapot they will never use.

With spines curved over tabletops, mouths pursed, and eyes critiquing every inch of clay, busy fingers are encouraged to keep time with the staccato beat of The Raconteurs playing in the background.

Ceramics I, or Art 265, is a six-week summer ceramics class that has been compressed into three weeks because of a scheduling problem, said Amanda Small, class instructor and graduate student in ceramics. However, she said students are keeping up with the six activities required for class credit. Three of them are hand-building projects, and three are throwing projects, during which students use a spinning wheel.

Kiley Huff, sophomore in graphic design, said Small makes the intense class more fun with interesting assignments.

"Time goes by really fast," Huff said, while smoothing the handle of her teapot. "The six hours feel like two. Everyone in this class is dedicated, so it doesn't feel like we're wasting our summer getting dirty and having fun."

While it is fun to create pieces of art, Huff said, an element of uncertainty always takes hold when students put their work in the kiln.

"It's frustrating to know that there's a 50 percent chance the piece may be cracked the next day, but you just hope for the best," she said.

Jake Perkinson, senior in painting, compared working with the clay to playing "beat the clock."

"It gets harder and harder as time goes – literally, the clay gets harder," Perkinson said. "But Amanda is really good at showing us ways to fix our ceramics and gives us hope when [our clay] is dry."

Perkinson signed up for the class because he wanted to learn how to throw pots before he graduated.

"Time disappears when you're throwing," he said. "It's really hard, but every time I do it, I get better."

He also said he did not count on using math in an art class, but had to buy a protractor to make his teapot.

"I'm making four teapots and have 52 pieces to assemble," Perkinson said, shifting his eyes to a diagram of his project.

Now that the painting major has had a taste of ceramics, he said he hopes he can find the time and resources to continue honing his craft.

"It's disappointing that we can't use the wheel or kiln outside of class. Now that I know how to do this stuff, I have to find my own kiln to create anything [out of clay] again."

TEMPORARY CLOSING

Union Subway will close for updates, renovations

By Hannah Blick
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Subway restaurant located in the lower level of the K-State Student Union will close for renovations on Monday and will remain closed until July 31, according to Jack Thoman, assistant director of business affairs for the Union.

Thoman said Subway has been serving K-State since February 1995, and has chosen to renew its contract for 10 more years. He said the Union Governing Board submitted a request for proposal to local sandwich stores to sign a contract for service in the Union.

"There were opportunities for many sub shops in the Manhattan area to respond to a proposal to open a store in the lower level of the Union," Thoman said. "Quizno's and Subway were the only two stores that responded to the proposal."

Along with the contract renewal, Subway has decided to update its facilities in the Union to make it more efficient and aesthetically pleasing, said Carol Green, regional manager for Rottinghause Co., Inc., which owns the Subway in the Union. The renovations will include doubling most of the store's appliances, like soft drink machines and microwaves, as well as altering the front counter to include one central ordering station that splits into two lines where customers can custom-order their sandwiches. Green said the store will most likely hire more employees to compensate for the expansion.

"Provided all goes well, the plan is to open back up by lunchtime on [Thursday, July 31]," Green said.

K-State Student Union Subway

The restaurant will be closed from Monday, July 21 to Wednesday, July 30, reopening on July 31. For updates on renovation, visit www.union.ksu.edu.

Parvovirus at Fort Riley concerns dog owners

By Aubree Casper
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A highly contagious, ongoing outbreak of canine parvovirus was reported by Fort Riley officials in a press release Monday. The disease has been traced back to Bark Park, a dog park at Fort Riley, but area residents are being asked to use caution when exposing their dogs, especially puppies, to other dogs in public areas.

Dr. Ken Harkin, assistant professor of internal medicine at the K-State Veterinary Teaching Hospital, said parvovirus, or CPV, is an intestinal disease that initially affects the gastrointestinal tract of a dog, causing diarrhea and vomiting, and can later lead to severe dehydration.

CPV, if left untreated, can also enter the bloodstream and lower the count of white blood cells, making the dog more susceptible to generalized infection, which can be fatal.

A similar situation occurred in July 2007, said Deb Skidmore, Fort Riley media relations officer.

Harkin said the similar timing of the outbreaks is largely due to the fact that more people are outside walking their dogs.

Harkin stressed the need for veterinary care in preventing and curing CPV. He said the vaccine for the virus, which treats all strains.

"The virus is very stable and can survive for months. It is transmitted through the feces of infected dogs and is often transferred through keys, doors and shoes," Harkin said.

Humans are not affected by CPV.

While the K-State Veterinary Hospital has not seen an increase in recent cases of the virus, Harkin emphasized the chance of survival increases drastically if medical care is given to infected dogs immediately. The vaccine should be administered early to prevent the disease, but dog owners are advised to vaccinate their dogs as soon as possible if such treatments have not been taken care of previously.

Bark Park has closed but will re-open as soon as it has been cleared as a threat to the health of area dogs, Skidmore said.

Harkin said dog owners who have questions about CPV or other diseases should contact their veterinarians.

K-State-Salina campus offers computer camp

By Brad Dornes
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State is actively working to get middle-school-age children interested in computer programming by offering the Virtual World Summer Computer Camp at the Salina campus. The camp, which took place this week, is designed for children ages 11-14.

The Virtual World Summer Computer Camp started as a two-hour seminar last summer and has evolved into a three-day camp. The camp allowed its 14 campers to design a 3-D virtual world, explore K-State-Salina's department of engineering technology, learn computer programming through fun games and discover the basics of computer animation using Alice Software.

Alice Software is educational software that teaches students computer programming in a 3-D environment. Alice makes it easy to create an animation for telling a story, playing an interactive game or a video to share on the World Wide Web.

Troy Harding, associate professor of computer systems technology, said the software is used in middle-school, high-school and entry-level college computer programming classes.

"The software allows them to create their own world from scratch," Harding said. "Its users can add text and movement and do just about anything they want."

Harding said the software allows children to create a computer program without writing out the programming code.

"We are trying to get the kids interested in programming," he said. "This software allows them to create a story and use their imagination and creativity to the fullest."

Matt Binter | COLLEGIAN

Brooke Keller, sixth grader at Salina South Middle School, works on a computer at the virtual world summer computer camp at the K-State-Salina campus.

Once the camp is over, the campers get to take their virtual world with them and continue to play with the software, Harding said.

"The program is installed onto a flash drive that each child was provided with," Harding said. "That way they can continue learning about computer programming."

Staton Diehl, 12, and Colin Fouard, 13, both from Brookville, Kan., said that being able to attend the Salina camp was exciting and worthwhile.

"The program allows us to do anything we want," Diehl said. "Now I can do it at home."

Fouard said he agreed with Diehl and would recommend the camp to others.

"I think the camp has been very fun and I'm glad I came," he said.

Jeff Boswell, junior in electronic and computer engineering technology and student assistant at the camp, said he has really enjoyed helping the participants at this year's camp.

"Seeing the campers' creativity and imaginations running wild has been pretty interesting," Boswell said. "Their creations have ranged from cities to airplanes to dragons."

New women's boutique set to open on Poyntz

Nathaniel LaRue | COLLEGIAN

Mannequins at Kieu's are dressed for the store's grand opening Friday. The boutique will cater to high-school and college-age women.

By Whitney Hodgin
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Kieu's (pronounced "Q's"), a Lawrence-based boutique that features clothes, shoes and accessories, will have its grand opening in Manhattan on Friday. The family-owned store, located at 431 Poyntz Ave., is aimed at high-school and college-age women.

With the slogan "Girls love to be spoiled," customers can expect to find anything and everything feminine at the new boutique. Boho dresses and hobo bags; oversized sunglasses and layered tanks; flats, pumps and even fingernail polish will all be offered at prices comparable to similar stores in Aggieville.

"We used the slogan in Lawrence and it stuck because it's true," said Thao Nguyen, who owns the store with her sister, Thuy Nguyen. "Clothes are a girl's best friend. Well, actually diamonds are, but ..."

Thao said Kieu's was voted "best women's clothing shop" four of the first five years it was open in Lawrence by The University Daily Kansan, the University of Kansas student newspaper.

"We were getting a lot of girls coming in from K-State looking for cute clothes, so we thought that Manhattan was a good place to start a second store," Thao said.

Clothing and accessories for school, work, prom and girls' nights out decorate the store's bare white walls, which are practically translucent behind the clothes' trendy, seasonal colors. There are six dressing rooms outfitted with gigantic mirrors and curtains that act as doors just begging to be thrown aside by hopeful customers.

Though Kieu's will be competing with other area clothing stores catering to young women, the sisters said they have already talked to neighbors and other residents who have stopped by the store to welcome them to Manhattan. They also said they look forward to greeting and helping customers in their new town.

"We have anything girls would need," Thao said.

City Park Pavilion, which dates to the 1930s, has been slated for capital improvements worth approximately $800,000.

City works to finance new pavilion

By Jenna Scavuzzo
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Manhattan's 2008 Capital Improvements Program, which was approved by the City Commission, proposes that Manhattan's classic, 1930s-era City Park Pavilion be replaced by a larger, more aesthetic facility. Now city officials are moving ahead with formal plans for the project.

The pavilion has been home to picnics, day camps, ice skaters and concertgoers in Manhattan for more than 70 years, but many community members think the facility needs a dramatic update to remain viable. The project plan for the new pavilion includes a larger multi-purpose space, an expanded ice arena, new cooling tubes for the ice surface, a combined camp and ice skating office, and restroom modifications, according to the City of Manhattan Web site.

The city has approved the total CIP project budget removal and replacement of the facility for approximately $800,000, said Bob Strawn, city commissioner. The project will be financed over a period of ten years by collecting payments through the Park Development Fund, which will start in 2010.

The design process has already required many additional modifications, which has led to a struggle to reduce expenditures and remain within budget, Strawn said.

These modifications include a stone veneer to match the Larry Norvell Band Shell, upgraded finishes, a 20-feet addition to the existing 60-feet ice skating rink, additional storage for the Manhattan Municipal Band and expanded public picnic areas.

In order to fund these modifications, Strawn said he made it his mission to minimize the cost of the original plan and begin fundraising for the project. He said he needed to pause the design process and raise an additional $1 million to fund the modifications he thinks are necessary.

Strawn has raised $600,000 so far, and if his efforts continue to be successful, the new pavilion will be built this winter and be open by next summer.

"When I saw the original plan, I thought it was completely unacceptable," Strawn said. "A metal building in City Park is totally inappropriate, and the ice rink was much too undersized.

"City Park is the crown jewel of this community, and it deserves a limestone building. I'm still hopeful we can achieve our goal."

Strawn said he began fundraising for the project a few weeks ago by calling community residents and explaining what he wants to accomplish. Strawn is also accepting contributions by mail to City Hall. He said community members are generally very open to his ideas.

"The community has known that the need for a City Park remodel has been there for quite some time," said Curt Loupe, director of Parks and Recreation. "It's a '30s-era pavilion, and it's

Nation on the brink

Montana deserves praise for voicing popular dissent in Second Amendment case

BRANDON LOHMAN

"But when a long train of abuses and usurpations, pursuing invariably the same object evinces a design to reduce [the People] under absolute despotism, it is their right, it is their duty, to throw off such Government, and to provide new Guards for their future security." – Preamble, Declaration of Independence, 1776.

In a sternly worded letter, Montana Secretary of State Brad Thompson, along with several Montana state legislators, recently advised the Supreme Court that a collective rights interpretation to the Second Amendment in a controversial case would be "unwise."

Though it never explicitly said, the letter could reasonably be interpreted as an offhanded threat of secession. Some would say such a promise is childish politics. I would tend to praise Montana officials for bringing to light the very real implications of what D.C. v. Heller could have brought upon this nation – civil war.

Though the specifics of the case centered around gun rights in the District of Columbia, the greater issue is the true meaning of the Second Amendment and encroachment by the federal government on both individual and state rights. Montana's gripe lies in its own state constitution's provision for an individual right to keep and bear arms – which was approved and ratified by the federal government upon admission to the Union in 1889 – being summarily tossed aside.

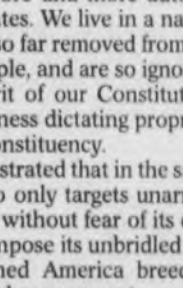
Commentators in the blogosphere like this scenario to a breach of contract that would give Montana a legal right to secede. Others claim the state has no right under any circumstances to leave. While the citizens might not have a legal right to secede, they do have a human right to personal liberty sofar that they do not infringe upon the liberty of others.

A collective rights interpretation would have effectively repealed the Second Amendment without going through all the bother of ratification by the states. We live in a nation where the ideals of federation are being eroded day by day as the central government usurps more and more autonomy from individual states. We live in a nation where lawmakers are so far removed from the needs of common people, and are so ignorant of the tenets and spirit of our Constitution, that they have no business dictating propriety to a misrepresented constituency.

History has demonstrated that in the same way as a criminal who only targets unarmed victims, a government without fear of its own people is one free to impose its unbridled will upon them. A disarmed America breeds a more belligerent federal government.

When our populace is so divided along partisan lines and overwhelmingly against the current administration and its business-as-usual politics, a volatile political climate emerges. A strike against the Second Amendment, inevitably followed by a ban on weapons and their subsequent confiscation, would be a very dangerous spark in this developing powder keg.

True patriotism is not blindly following our leaders, but rather the courage to stand up for an ideal at the risk of one's own personal life, fortunes and prosperity in the face of social unacceptability. I laud the Montana lawmakers for making the hard decision to verbalize what many more are thinking. While a critic might say their threat would never have come to pass, I would say that more states – many more – would follow Montana's seditious lead. The right to arms is one taken, not given, to protect us from the tyrannies of evil men. Even in states whose electorates refuse to participate in secession, citizens from across the nation would stand tall in open rebellion with arms to deliver themselves from an oppressive government whose aims are to a strip of their means to defend both themselves and their way of life.



Jefferson once wrote that the tree of liberty must be occasionally nourished with the blood of patriots and tyrants. While I can see our nation's need for revolution or reform, I'd rather see our bloated government reduced to its former magnificence through use of the system, rather than slaughter between brethren. Montana's incendiary words serve as a stark reminder to our leaders that their power is derived from the consent of the governed and is not absolute. Those who can truly appreciate liberty can appreciate the daunting but necessary duty as the Montana legislature was forced to perform in preserving the U.S. and sparing its people from a bloody revolt.

Disney gun lawsuit makes mockery of court challenges

JESSICA HENSLEY

What is it with people in Florida?

It seems any time there is a ridiculous court case receiving national attention, Florida is somehow involved.

First, the 2000 Presidential Election and the following Supreme Court circus, then the Terri Schiavo case, and now, a surprising Second Amendment-based lawsuit against the infamous Walt Disney Corporation.

According to a report in Monday's edition of the Orlando Sentinel, former Walt Disney World security guard Edwin Sotomayor filed a lawsuit Friday challenging Disney's ban on employees bringing guns to work and seeking to get his job back.

He was fired July 7 from his job as an unarmed security guard at Disney's Animal Kingdom when he refused to cooperate with company officials who wanted to know whether he had brought a gun to work with him.

Sotomayor admitted he had brought a gun – a .45-caliber Springfield – but he would not speak with Disney officials about it because he believes he has the right to bring the weapon to work and not be subject to search.

The dispute, according to a Friday report in the Miami Herald, arose because of a "new and controversial National Rifle Association-backed law" which gives Floridians the right to carry guns almost anywhere in their cars, including to their places of employment. Disney World claims to be exempt from the new law because of a provision that exempts companies that hold federal permits for the use of explosives. Disney has such a permit for its fireworks shows.

Sotomayor's lawsuit, filed at the Orange County Courthouse, claims his constitutional rights were violated and asks Disney to give him back his job.

He was quoted in a CNN report as saying: "It is a big deal to me, and it is a big deal to me and thousands of people around the country that believe Disney is, you know, very un-American, and obviously, on the Fourth of July, they became very un-American."

Zoraya Suarez, spokeswoman for the Disney Corp., reaffirmed its position on the matter: "We have no idea what this lawsuit is about. It doesn't change our position that the exemption is clear. We won't compromise the safety of our guests and cast members at the Walt Disney World Resort."

While there is much debate surrounding the Second Amendment, with valid arguments on both sides of the aisle, surely we can agree that there must be some limitations.

What exactly is the rationalization behind carrying a gun at Disney World? Was Sotomayor planning hunting? With a .45-caliber hand gun? Perhaps it was for self-defense purposes – just in case Mickey Mouse gets a little testy.

Placing limitations on a constitutionally guaranteed right is a very serious issue that requires serious consideration and debate. This lawsuit and others like it do nothing but make a mockery of the rights which they claim to be protecting.

In this case, the Disney Corporation appears to be well within its rights to fire Sotomayor. The law, and common sense, is on its side, even if it is "un-American."

TO THE POINT

Already forgotten?

The Wall Street Journal recently called it the "war to rival Iraq."

In October 2001, the U.S. went to Afghanistan to fight the Taliban. We praised our troops and overnight, thousands of vehicles donned the yellow ribbon magnets encouraging everyone to "Support our Troops." Iraq soon overshadowed the battle in that far-away desert, though, and as the car magnets disappeared, so did our faith in the government and our love of our brave soldiers as many became outraged about our military presence in Iraq.

TO THE POINT is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

June 2008 was the deadliest month in Afghanistan, but few people know that. The single deadliest attack on U.S. soldiers in Afghanistan just occurred a few days ago, but few know that, either. Funding for the war in Afghanistan has increased from $20 billion to $35 billion in the last year, but not many people know that. We forgot.

So, remember the 32,000 U.S. troops who are still fighting in Afghanistan – the most ever since the war's beginning. This is a reminder that Americans are still dying for freedom around the world, and that forgetting them is forgetting why we are proud to be Americans. To paraphrase those yellow car ribbons, we must "Never Forget" to "Support our Troops."

Local man arrested for 12 drug offenses

By Eric Davis
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Riley County Police Department arrested Michael Lee Baker, 43, of Manhattan, on 12 drug-related charges Monday night at the intersection of Kansas Highway 18 and Walnut Drive, RCPD Lt. Kurt Moldrup said.

RCPD officers stopped Baker's vehicle and carried out a search warrant. Police then arrested him on two counts of possession of a simulated controlled substance; four counts of sale of an opiate, opium or narcotic; two counts of not having a tax stamp; two counts of unlawful possession of a depressant; one count of unlawful sale of a depressant; and one count for unlawful use of a telecom device.

Stigma of "green vehicles" vanishes as hybrid sales continue to skyrocket

By Whitney Hodgin
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The stigma of owning a hybrid car has decreased in recent years due to astonishingly high gas prices and increased environmental awareness.

A hybrid vehicle combines two or more sources of power that provide propulsion power, making these automobiles more environmentally friendly, according to hybridcars.com.

These new vehicles were not always popular, though.

In the March 29, 2006 episode of "South Park," entitled "Smug Alert," one character's father purchases a "Toyonda Pious," a hybrid car that does not emit smog, but instead has a toxic gas called "smug."

The episode depicted gas friendly hybrid car owners as being extremely self-satisfied while patting each other on the backs for making a "green" decision.

Now, though, Americans across the country have traded in their SUVs for cost-effective, environmentally-friendly alternatives, like the real "Toyonda Pious."

"The Toyota Prius is our most popular hybrid," said Jason Kridner, sales professional at Little Apple Toyota-Honda.

"We have a waiting list of about 60 to 90 days until we even receive the next shipment."

Many customers said hybrids no longer come with the supposed feature of smugness, but rather a sense of responsibility, Kridner said.

Joe Philipp, a Manhattan resident who once owned a Jeep Grand Cherokee, said he made the switch to a Prius after becoming more environmentally conscious.

"I love my Prius," Philipp said. "I bought it because my son got his degree in environmental sciences, and I think his 'greenness' influenced my decision. Also, my Jeep got 14 miles per gallon, and the Prius gets 42."

Philipp has owned his Prius for four years and has yet to have anything replaced or repaired, but he said the vehicle does not handle well in snow or on mountains.

By the time the car has driven up a mountain road, the battery will have lost much of its charge, but it will recharge itself on the way down, Philipp said.

The Prius also does not lose speed when coasting, which can lead to unnecessarily sudden stops at the hands of an inexperienced hybrid driver.

Though hybrids might be more environmentally friendly, many consumers seem to be intimidated by the price tag.

Kridner said the popular Toyota Camry costs about $22,000.

Most base model hybrids cost about $26,000.

However, they come with an eight-year or 100,000-mile warranty, Kridner said.

Mir Anwar, owner of Renewable Resources, a company that installs alternative energy resources like windmills and solar panels, said that rising fuel prices have been a blessing in disguise.

"It has opened the public's eyes to alternative fuel sources and conservation," Anwar said. "Instead of it being all about mega-SUVs like Hummers, it's about miles per gallon. People are catching on and don't want to be wasteful."

Anwar knows some people might have an issue with losing the ability to take apart and rebuild their cars by hand, which might soon become "the old-fashioned way," but he said the change is an important one.

"I'm sure people who are accustomed to pulling out a wrench and fixing their clunker under the shade of a tree are against this change, but it's a change that needs to be embraced," he said.

Cycling Club stays fit, travels to races during summer months

By Salena Strate
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

With rising gas prices, one local group might actually be benefiting from the pain at the pump.

"It seems like cycling in Manhattan is the new, cool thing," said Tyler Whetstone, president of the KSU Cycling Club. "But we will see how long that lasts. There is still that leap between recreational cycling and commuting."

Whetstone, senior in industrial engineering, said the club members who stayed in Manhattan during the summer usually hang out together outside of training rides.

"Every cyclist is friendly, and the people are awesome," he said. "You have to be a little goofy to dress up in spandex and ride a bike."

Whetstone said the club will get together soon to watch the Tour de France, which began July 5 and continues until July 27.

Club members use summertime to accumulate base miles, which are miles spent on the bike. The group also travels to local races. For example, Whetstone said he will compete in the Kansas City mountain bike race on Saturday.

The KSU Cycling Club was registered as a campus club in the late 1990s but started gaining popularity three years ago. It currently has more than 35 participants.

Whetstone said one unusal dynamic of the club is that some members are actual racers and some just enjoy recreational riding. The club is sponsored by Student Governing Association, Trek Bikes and The Pathfinder, a local "supporting shop."

"We don't have a coach, but we still manage to do well in our conference," he said.

Zach Dubas, vice president of the Cycling Club, said a lot of the business talk in the club's weekly meetings involves races. In the fall, the club will split into two groups – the team for the racers and the club for the riders.

"For people who have never done it, it's a pretty good deal," Dubas, senior in mechanical engineering, said. "You are surrounded by a wealth of knowledge and you don't have to have a great bike to like the sport."

The collegiate competitions are divided into three divisions and two seasons. K-State belongs to the North Central Collegiate Conference.

In the fall, the club races in the mountain bike class.

Tanner Marshall, who is in his third year of competing with the club, said mountain bike racing is his favorite season because of the skill level.

"There is far more technique skill, including the ability to read the trail," Marshall, senior in mechanical engineering, said. "It's a lifestyle in general, and I enjoy being around the same people."

The other fall season division is cyclo-cross. Cyclo-cross is a form of cross-country cycling, which requires riders to often stop and carry their bikes up the trail.

Springtime is the season for road racing.

"We come together as a team and most people think it isn't fun to travel in a 16-passenger van with smelly racers, but we make it fun," Dubas said.

Routine maintenance, safety keys to worry-free biking

By Aubree Casper
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Riding a bicycle around campus and Manhattan can be intimidating if a rider is not familiar with basic bike care and rules of the road. Like a car, bikes require maintenance, and some simple care can extend the life of a bike and save the owner a lot of money.

MAINTENANCE

While the quality of a bicycle can vary considerably, all bikes have two parts that need to be checked regularly. Tyler Whetstone, senior in industrial engineering and bicycle repairperson at The Pathfinder, an outdoor equipment store in Manhattan, said airing up bike tires at least once a week and lubricating the bike chain with a synthetic Teflon lubricant, not WD-40, can prevent other problems, especially if these tasks are done after the bike is exposed to wetness.

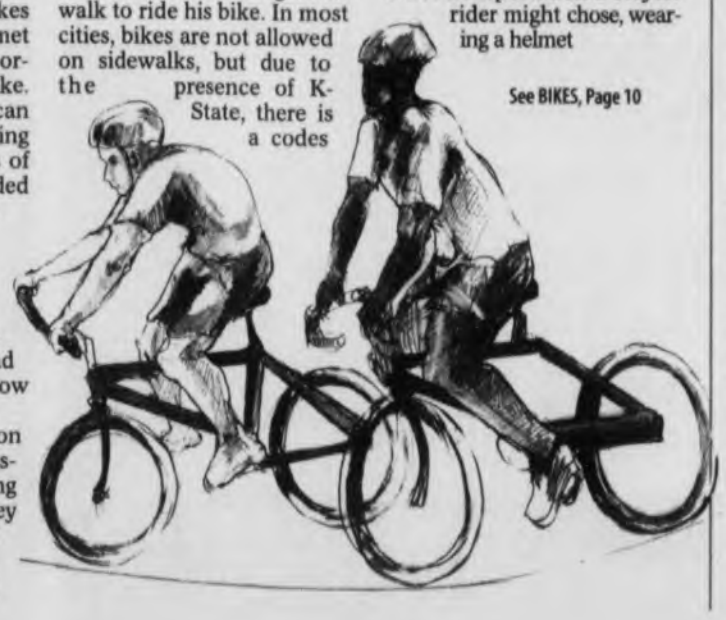
Whetstone also said that when airing up tires, bikers should check the tires and look for the recommended pounds per square inch range, or PSI. This number can range from 30-110 PSI and over- or under-filling the tires can lead to bent rims or blow-outs.

When at-home bicycle care is not enough, bike shops are available to inspect and repair two-wheeled transportation. Shops like The Pathfinder offer free estimates after inspection, which Whetstone likened to a "47-point Midas inspection." Trained repair specialists look at the tightness of brake and shift levers, headsets, bolts and nuts, cleanliness, chains, and alignment, and every other part of a bicycle.

Typically, when a bike is taken into a repair shop, it will go through an estimate process. The repairperson will then call the owner, tell he or she what is wrong with their bike and give options to fix it. Once a repair is scheduled, most owners have their bicycles back within a few days. In many cases, a bike needs a de-railer adjustment, brake repairs or an adjustment to the tension of the spokes.

Whetstone, who is also the president of the KSU Cycling Club, said that making sure a bike is in good condition – especially checking to ensure that the brakes work – and wearing a helmet might be the two most important cautions a biker can take. Riding around the city can be dangerous, but just taking the time to learn the rules of biking and taking the needed precautions can save lives.

RULES OF THE ROAD



The crucial idea to keep in mind while biking is that bicyclists have the same rights on the road as car drivers and must follow the same rules.

"A bike is a car when on the road. Drivers get frustrated when a car is going 15 miles per hour, but they don't try to run them off the road or throw things at them like they do with bikes. [Cyclists] aren't trying to slow people down – we're just trying to get somewhere, too," Whetstone said.

Sidewalk riding is much more complicated and dangerous. Whetstone said the only time he was hit by a car was when he was using a sidewalk to ride his bike. In most cities, bikes are not allowed on sidewalks, but due to the presence of K-State, there is a codes clause in Manhattan allowing the operation of bicycles on sidewalks. In this case, the bike rider is treated as a pedestrian and must follow the same protocol as a walker, especially at crosswalks.

Not matter which method of transportation a bicycle rider might chose, wearing a helmet

MANHATTAN BIKE LINE

A fun way to explore campus

ERIC DAVIS

I have written a column before about a bike line I particularly enjoy riding in Manhattan and today, I am privileged to share another favorite trail.

Today's line is the one I usually take to campus. There are many ways to get from one corner of campus to the other, but I think this one takes the best advantage of the variation in elevation.

This particular line begins in front of Pizza Shuttle, located at the intersection of Denison Avenue and Claflin Road. Begin by exiting the parking lot and heading east on Claflin.

A low-grade hill begins its decent here, so it's easy to gather some speed to start the ride.

Take the first right and you find yourself looking up the only extended positive grade on the trip. As long as you don't stop peddling, you won't lose a lot of speed and your legs will get a pretty good workout.

When you reach the top of the hill, your legs will be ready for a break, and thankfully, the hill empties into several, short bike paths.

One word of warning – the straight sidewalk on the far left intersects with a driveway. There is low visibility there, and if a car is coming down the drive, neither biker nor driver would see the other until the biker lands in a heap of broken human.

Once you have safely made it through the drive, take the flat sidewalk until you reach Bosco Student Plaza.

There is not usually much going on around the plaza, but take the turn with caution. It is easy to run into a pedestrian, and that is a headache no bicyclist wants.

Ride across the plaza and exit on the southeast side, which will take you over the triangle median.

You are now on Vattier Street, approaching the best part of the ride.

Before the construction in front of McCain Auditorium, you could take that sidewalk down to the intersection of Manhattan and Bluemont avenues. Because of the work being done, you have to take Vattier Street down, but don't worry, it's just as much fun as the hill.

My favorite way to cruise is by standing up on my pedals. I think it feels more like you're surfing that way.

The hill levels out with enough flat pavement to slow down before you get to Manhattan Avenue.

This is a great way to get through campus. My friends and I usually take this route to Aggieville when the weather permits.

Though the route is entertaining, there are places where bicyclists must pay special attention.

Bikes also serve as a great way to get home after drinking, but remember to be mindful of others on the route and always be a responsible bike rider.

BLOOD DONATIONS

Summer blood drive critical for Red Cross

By Brad Dornes
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The American Red Cross will sponsor a summer blood drive this week for all Manhattan residents. People can donate from 10 a.m. to 3 p.m., Wednesday and Thursday in the K-State Student Union Ballroom.

Megan Smith, area communications specialist for the Red Cross, said there are always fewer donations in the summer.

"The Red Cross puts on a blood drive once a semester," Smith said. "Since there are not as many people here during the summer months, our goal is 100 total donations."

Kristi Ingalls, Red Cross donor recruitment representative, said the donated blood will help people in Kansas and Oklahoma, known as the Central Plains Region.

"The blood will go to help emergency rooms and hospitals in this region," she said. "All blood types are needed, but types O and B are the most important."

Anyone in good health who is at least 17 years old and weighs 110 pounds or more can donate blood, Ingalls said.

"Donors are asked to drink plenty of fluids to be well hydrated," she said. "Eating iron-rich foods such as meat and spinach is also beneficial when donating blood."

Refreshments will be provided to all donors, along with a complementary t-shirt and a NASCAR lanyard, Ingalls said.

Susie Shaw, medical technologist at Mercy Regional Health Center, said more than half of America is capable of donating blood.

"Sixty percent of the U.S. population is eligible to donate blood," she said. "However, only five percent of the population will donate."

Shaw also said the shortage of blood in the U.S. would be non-existent if every eligible adult donated twice a year.

"Approximately 34,000 pints of blood are used each day in the United States, with 500 of those pints being used right here in the Central Plains Region," she said.

Shaw said the average person can donate every 56 days, which is important since there is always a shortage of available blood for transfusions.

"Someone in the United States will need blood every 3 seconds," she said. "One donation can go to save the lives of three different people."

BLOOD DONATION FACTS AND FIGURES:

- There is no substitute for human blood.
- One in three people will need blood in their lifetime.
- Blood makes up about 7 percent of the human body weight.
- An adult of average weight has about 10 to 12 pints of blood.
- Donated blood is separated into 3 parts: red blood cells, plasma and platelets.
- There are about one billion red blood cells in two to three drops of blood.
- Volunteers provide nearly all of the nation's blood supply.
- Donating blood is extremely safe and easy — each needle is sterile and disposed of after a single use.

On-campus bike usage gained popularity in 1970s

As rising gas prices send students scrambling for less expensive modes of transportation, this Collegian article from July 7, 1971, proves that one increasingly popular option has its roots in a prior generation of K-State students.

'EASY RIDERS' ENJOY CAMPUS CYCLING

By Francine Stuckey
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

KANSAS STATE UNIVERSITY ARCHIVES

A full on-campus bicycle rack is a popular parking place and gathering spot in this July 7, 1971, photo.

Whether it's to burn off excess weight, solve the parking space problem or fight air pollution, more people are taking to the road on bicycles.

"Bicycles bring freedom," Nancy Lueers, sophomore in home economics education, said. "It's a transportation that lets you enjoy everything around you more."

"It's faster than walking. I get up late and I'd never have time to get to class if I walked," Ardis Grace, sophomore in secondary education, said.

"I got too many traffic tickets. With a bicycle, I don't have to leave as early to find a parking place. I can park next to the building and go to class," Arthur Pease, junior in food science, said.

"With a bike, I can get to class in six minutes. Driving took from 15 to 35 [minutes] because I had to warm up the car and find a parking place," Jim Nicholas, senior in electrical engineering, said.

"I wasn't getting too much exercise shifting gears and working the brakes in my car," Nicholas continued.

Nicholas is planning a bicycle trip to the East Coast and Canada in August.

He plans to ride at least 1,800 miles, traveling 120 miles a day.

"I will ride four hours in the morning and four hours in the evening, averaging 15 miles per hour. I think it is possible if the wind is in the right direction," he said.

Nicholas decided to ride his bicycle on this trip for several reasons.

"After buying my bike, I didn't have enough money to fly," he laughed.

"School the last few years has been mental exercise," he continued. "A long bicycle trip will be physical. It's a challenge too," he remarked.

Ray DeJulio, coordinator of the UFM bicycle touring group, said more and more people are riding bikes for fun.

"Bicycles aren't pollutants, either, and riding gets you in shape," DeJulio noted.

Forty people signed up for the UFM bicycle touring group.

"It's safer to go with a bigger group if you're touring," DeJulio advised. "A super big group might cause a hassle. A group of 10 to 15 people is the best size."

Group members usually ride 10-speed bicycles.

"You can get an average 10-speed for $80. The prices go up to $200," DeJulio said. "The more expensive bicycles have more precise parts and lighter frames."

Manhattan merchants agreed that three-speeds and 10-speeds are the two most popular bicycles in this area.

"This year we've sold more than double the usual number of bicycles," Dave Kowalzyk, a local salesman, said. "We've sold 122 percent more this year than in the same time last year."

Potter Photo Predictions

Recently released production photos from "Harry Potter and the Half-Blood Prince" reveal clues about the latest cinematic adaptation of the wildly successful books

ERIC DAVIS

"Harry Potter and the Half-Blood Prince," the latest installment in the series of Harry Potter movies, is slated for release on Nov. 21. Fans have been calling for a trailer for weeks now and the studio answered, but not in the way many would have hoped.

Rather than producing a trailer, production pictures have been released, letting us know a little more about what the movie will be like.

If nothing else, these pictures let us get a little more excited about a movie most fans already know will be awesome.

Be careful as you read on if you are one of the casual fans who only watches the movies. There will be spoilers.

In the book, Horace Slughorn is described as a short, fat man with a bushy mustache, but we can see from this picture he is none of the above. Instead, he is a tall, relatively skinny man with no visible facial hair. He will no doubt be the vain, pure-blood-loving character from the book in the movie version, but without the physical attributes to back it up.

Another troubling inaccuracy with this photo lies in the students that make up the class. Neville Longbottom can be seen standing in the back of the room and all the Potter fans know he does not take potions in his sixth year.

DUMBLEDORE IN HIS OFFICE (TOP RIGHT):

At first glance, this seems to be an average shot of Dumbledore sitting in his office with a worried look on his face.

When the story begins in the book, Dumbledore is off on an adventure looking for Marvolo's ring. What happens when he finds it? His arm is cursed and he almost dies due to the horcurx's effects.

This picture shows Dumbledore deep in thought, perhaps worrying about the intricate plan he is setting up for Harry.

While we can't be sure what is going through Dumbledore's head, at the very least, we know the wheels are turning.

RON PLAYING QUIDDITCH (MIDDLE RIGHT):

As those who have already read the book know, Ron joins the Quidditch team in his sixth year, which creates another exciting route for the story to travel.

Some might think this picture depicts part of the game, but it has to be the tryouts because of all the new people standing behind Ron. None of them have been seen on the Quidditch pitch before, so we can assume they are all wannabes.

I hope the quidditch games in the new movie will be like those in "Harry Potter and the Chamber of Secrets" – exciting and action-packed.

DRACO IN THE CORNER (BOTTOM RIGHT):

One of the most biggest storylines in the sixth book revolves around Harry's obsession with catching Draco Malfoy, his arch-enemy, in Death Eater activities.

We find out at the end of the book that Malfoy is, in fact, helping to plot the demise of Dumbledore.

We can only assume this is a picture of Draco contemplating the difficult task the Dark Lord has set for him.

"Hellboy" latest super-hit

"Hellboy II"

Movie review by Brendan Praeger

When "Hellboy" hit theaters in 2004, director Guillermo del Toro did not have much respect in the critical community.

"Hellboy," though, was decidedly above-average for a comic book movie. It blew contemporary films like "The Punisher" and "Elektra" out of the water and gave us a superhero that looked more like a villain. Del Toro made a good movie and almost $60 million at the box office, but a good comic book adaptation still does not usually bring a lot of praise from jaded critics.

That all changed with "Pan's Labyrinth." Del Toro showed unbridled imagination in a Spanish-language film that earned three Oscars and the critical praise he deserved.

Suddenly, "Hellboy II: The Golden Army" became appealing to people who had passively overlooked the first film. But even if "Hellboy II" is riding on the success of del Toro's most recent film, it deserves all the attention it gets.

The plot revolves around mythical creatures that have honored an ancient truce by staying hidden for thousands of years. Their prince returns from exile to start a war with humanity using the indestructible Golden Army.

The plot might sound a bit nerdy, but the real focus of the movie is character development. Hellboy (Ron Perlman) is having relationship trouble with his girlfriend, Liz (Selma Blair), professional trouble with his boss (Jeffrey Tambor) and territorial issues with his new team leader, the robotic German Johann Krauss (Seth MacFarlane).

As Hellboy battles trolls and forest monsters, he also has to deal with his newfound publicity. In the beginning, he desperately wants to reveal himself to the world. When his cover is blown, he realizes that humans are relatively unkind to anyone different.

Hellboy's aquatic sidekick, Abe Sapien (Doug Jones), also has issues to deal with. Jones played Sapien in the first movie, but his character was voiced by David Hyde Pierce. Pierce refused to return for the sequel, saying that Jones deserved a chance to bring his own characters to life, and Jones does an excellent job moving Sapien beyond a simple supporting role.

Visually, "Hellboy II" is stunning. The special effects and imaginative creatures are worth the ticket price, and the numerous action scenes should please anyone who just wants to see Hellboy's enormous fist in use.

The movie also has an excellent sense of humor, highlighted by a scene in which Hellboy drinks beer in the shower while contemplating a broken relationship, only to sing a drunken version of Barry Manilow's "Can't Smile Without You."

"Hellboy II" also avoids the comic book sequel syndrome of more villains and less brains. As Hellboy protects humanity, he realizes that he has more in common with the creatures he is fighting than he thought.

With this week's release of "The Dark Knight," another critically praised comic book adaptation, "Hellboy II" should not get lost in the shuffle of summer blockbusters.

PAVILION | Additional space will increase popular camp's capacity not in good shape. By the time it's finished, we'll have a much nicer facility and better security. The updated design plan includes a larger format with stone and different finishes."

Loupe said the Little Apple Day Camp, a popular Manhattan summer camp, will have more space for activities, and the camp's directors will be able to enroll more participants. Last summer, the camp was full in two hours.

The public area, which is used by many university and community organizations, will be remodeled, and the pavilion stage will be removed permanently, Loupe said.

"We want the updated City Park to be something that community members can take a lot of pride in," he said. "It will be a much nicer-appearing pavilion, one that's not falling down."

Bruce McMillan, architect for the new facility, said he thinks it is important to provide a nice pavilion for the community.

"The Pavilion has a predominant presence in City Park," McMillan said. "I think it will get a really positive reaction from Manhattan once it's finished." and using hand signals are necessary.

"Pointing and signaling, and making clear your intentions on the road, will bring you far better luck when riding a bike," Whetstone said.

The U.S. Department of Transportation reported that nearly 800 people die riding their bicycles and 540,000 riders end up in the emergency room each year. One in eight riders who are injured after an accident suffer brain injuries that could have been lessened or prevented entirely by wearing a helmet.

In addition to head protection, wearing bright colors and buying reflective accessories like ankle straps and flashers will increase a rider's chances of being seen by a vehicle and staying alive.

Sunflower governor to national VP?

Sebelius remains potential Obama running mate

By Aubree Casper
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Christina Klein | COLLEGIAN

When John Gilligan was serving the state of Ohio as governor in 1974, his daughter moved to Kansas to begin her pursuit of political success.

Kathleen Sebelius did not start her political career in Kansas, and it might not end in the state either. She is not a Kansas native, but that is where she launched her political career as a state representative in 1987, according to ksgovernor.com.

First elected to the governor's office in November 2002 and re-elected in 2006, Sebelius has made her mark with legislation about abortion, education and gun control. A 2006 report from SurveyUSA showed she had one of the highest approval ratings among governors nationwide with 60 percent support, making it clear that Sebelius is still beating the odds as a Democratic governor in Republican Kansas.

STATEHOUSE ROCK

"Sebelius was able to balance Kansas' budget in her first year in office without raising taxes or cutting funding for education," according to a 2005 Time Magazine article on "America's 5 Best Governors."

The article only scratches the surface of Sebelius' record while in office as governor of Kansas. Republicans and Democrats alike often say they cannot deny her progress while in the capital.

A proponent of public schools, Sebelius has increased funding for state-supported education. She has also proposed state-funded healthcare to all children age five or younger, according to her Web site.

An extensive list of Sebelius' political characteristics would include a typical politician's quirks, but the ability to gain bipartisan respect might top that list. A Democratic governor in a state where right-leaning voters outnumber their more liberal neighbors nearly 2-to-1 is sure to get some national attention. The second-term governor's name might soon be on the lips of every major news anchor, political analyst and voter in the U.S.

LONG LISTS, SHORT LISTS, RED LISTS, BLUE LISTS

No matter the length or political party of origin, most major lists of possible vice-presidential candidates for Barack Obama, the Illinois senator with Kansas roots and presumptive Democratic presidential nominee, tout Sebelius as a contender for the 2008 vice-presidential nod. Originally put on short lists for cabinet positions by most media outlets, Sebelius has appeared in serious "veepstakes" chatter on CNN, FoxNews, CBS and almost every other serious vice-presidential list.

"It's hard to imagine that her name's not going to appear on everybody's list," said Mark Mellman, a political analyst for the Washington Post.

In political jargon, the "long list" is the original compilation of every potential choice for vice president and cabinet members for a presidential candidate. Sebelius quickly made most of those as an early public supporter of Obama. Sebelius surprised some politicos when she began showing up on more justified "short lists," with only five to ten other possible choices.

"The decision and timetable for the best person to help Senator Obama lead the country is entirely up to him," Sebelius said.

"I am supporting him because he is a great leader, and I am confident he will choose the best partner from an array of talented individuals. I will do all I can in the upcoming months to help Barack Obama become the next president – he is the right leader to bring people together for real change desperately needed in our country."

Other potential running mates for Obama include Connecticut Sen. Chris Dodd, Indiana Sen. Evan Bayh, Delaware Sen. Joseph Biden Jr., New York Sen. Hillary Clinton, former North Carolina Sen. John Edwards, Nebraska Sen. Chuck Hagel and New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson.

LOOKING AHEAD

Concerns over Sebelius' national popularity cause some analysts to wonder if she has enough influence to win Obama's favor. Jenny Davidson, communications director for the Kansas Democratic Party, said that while it is impossible to tell who or what Obama is looking for in a running mate, the positive progress Sebelius has made in Kansas as governor and her delivery of the national Democratic party's official response to President Bush's last State of the Union address will catch the attention of national press.

Davidson said Sebelius is appealing in general because she has been "successful in a moderately Republican state."

No matter who he choses as his vice-presidential candidate, Davidson said Obama is not writing Kansas off as an unwinnable "red state." In fact, according to the Huffington Post, Sebelius' greatest potential asset to Obama is her proven ability to reach across party lines and get things done.

Obama was recently quoted during a radio interview as saying, "I love Kathleen Sebelius. I think she is as talented a public official as there is right now. ... She can work with all people of all walks of life, but I promised that I am not going to say anything about my vice president until I actually introduce my vice president."

Obama told the New York Times in June that he is in no hurry to pick a running mate, but as the list grows shorter, Sebelius remains a major contender in the 2008 race to the vice-presidency.

EMPLOYMENT

Campus minimum wage increases

By Jenna Scavuzzo
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Though the K-State minimum wage has been raised 50 cents, there has not been any significant effect on campus jobs, said human resource professional Frieda Beat.

The university minimum wage was increased from $6.50 to $7 on June 15. The wage has been steadily increasing over the past year, she said. It was raised to $6.50 from $6.00 on August 12, 2007.

Beat said while students who work on campus are getting paid more, the wage increase has not significantly impacted campus jobs.

"I don't think the raise has made a big difference as far as hiring people," Beat said.

"I think the biggest difference it has made is that it has increased the budget for department funding."

Heather Reed, assistant dean of student life, said she agrees that aside from students earning more money, the minimum wage increase has not directly affected campus jobs.

"I'm not sure the increase has been so significant that it's made a big impact," Reed said. "It's wonderful that students are making more money, but offices have certain budgets, so that impacts how many hours students can work."

Some students said they are appreciative of the increase, and that it has affected how much money they take home and number of hours they work.

"I've made more money since the minimum wage was increased," said Zach Harmon, junior in management information systems. "The wage raise has made it so my boss doesn't have to hire as many people, so I get more hours, too."

Voice your opinion about minimum wage on our online poll at www.kstatecollegian.com.

Manhattan residents discuss Discovery Center feasibility

By Brad Dornes
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Manhattan public expressed their concerns and ideas about the Flint Hills Prairie Discovery Center at an open house Tuesday evening. The Discovery Center is planned as a focal point of the South End Downtown Redevelopment Area.

The open house was conducted by a team of nationally-recognized museum planning experts from E. Verner Johnson and Associates, Museum Insights, Gerard Hilferty and Associates and Economic Stewardship. These organizations will work with the city government of Manhattan to develop a master plan for the Discovery Center.

Guy Hermann, who founded Museum Insights after serving as the director of museum planning for E. Verner Johnson and Associates for eight years, led the meeting.

"We are using all the good ideas the consultant team and citizens of Manhattan are coming up with," Hermann said. "We want to work with the whole community to find a workable solution."

With many Manhattan citizens voicing their concerns about the Discovery Center, Hermann said that nothing has been finalized.

"Our goal is to come up with a facility that is sustainable," he said. "It needs to be able to attract people from outside the city limits of Manhattan. If we find that it will not survive, then it is not too late to back out."

Hermann also said the project was still in its beginning stages. The building has no set exhibits, cost or design.

Elaine Carmichael, representative of Economic Stewardship, said the center should attract people from many towns but should also make sense for Manhattan residents.

BRI reviews procedures for emergency crews

A research assistant working in a Level-3 contaminated lab suddenly grabs his chest in pain. The assistant falls victim to an unexpected heart attack.

In this scenario, emergency responders and K-State Biosecurity Research Institute employees need to have their rescue plan perfected. On Friday morning, members of the BRI's first responders completed the first steps in their incident response and emergency preparedness plan.

"Our main goal was to check radio communications from all the responders because this building has lots of poured concrete walls and boosters," said Julie Johnson, BRI's biosafety officer and assistant vice president for research compli

CORRECTIONS AND CLARIFICATIONS

There are two corrections from last week's Collegian: Dr. Ken Harkin, associate professor of internal medicine at the K-State Veterinary Teaching hospital, was wrongly referred to as an assistant professor. To clarify, Harkin said keys and doors do not transfer the canine parvovirus.
Jake Perkinson was making four teacups, not teapots.

There is also a clarification: The students in Ceramics I make teapots that are functional and do plan on using what they make in class.

If you see something that should be corrected, call news editor Eric Davis at 785-532-6556 or e-mail news@spub.ksu.edu.

Annual Aggieville sidewalk sale features 1980s costume contest

The "Dog Days of Summer" aren't just going to be hot and long – they're going to be tubular.

Aggieville's annual distraction from Manhattan's summer heat will offer the usual sidewalk sales and community activities, but a 1980s costume contest promises to reward the three best-dressed attendees with gift baskets from Aggieville vendors. The Dog Days event, which begins Thursday and ends Saturday, will feature Friday night activities like free barbecue from Coco Bolos at 6 p.m. in Triangle Park followed by a costume contest at 7 at Zotcis Attire.

Sisters of Sound and the Manhattan Music Coalition will provide popular '80s music for a dance Friday evening.

Zotcis owner Sara Meyer said she and other Aggieville merchants will judge the costume contest.

"There are some really great prizes," Meyer said. "[Winners] will receive baskets with things like gift certificates and merchandise from Aggieville stores."

She also said Zotcis will have sales on shoes, sunglasses, jeans and other merchandise during all three days of the event.

Sisters of Sound will also be having event sales, owner Sarah Cunnick said. S.O.S. is having a "10-20-30 sale," which takes 10 percent off the price of new CDs and LPs, 20 percent off used CDs and 30 percent off used LPs.

"We have smash-and-grabs for people just starting to collect vinyl," she said. "They're boxes of 15 themed LPs selling for $5."

There will also be a haggler's bin where customers can name their price for certain items, as well as poster and shirt sales.

Cunnick said some smash-and-grab themes are "soundtrack for your life," "lounge music" and "foreign affair."

Most stores in Aggieville will be having sales, but merchants said shoppers should not expect everything to be displayed on sidewalks.

Cunnick said she encourages Aggieville customers hoping to find a good buy to take a look inside every store they are interested in, not just at what is displayed on the sidewalks.

"Some things are heat-sensitive, like vinyl and art supplies," she said. "And some owners just don't want to put their stuff outside, so it's always good to look inside, too."

Riley County Idol, rodeo highlight fair

By Brad Dornes
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Amusement rides, carnival food and rodeo events are upcoming attractions at the annual Riley County Fair, which will take place July 24-28 at Manhattan's CiCo Park.

Jennifer Wilson, Riley County extension director, said the county fair has been an annual event for many years.

"No one really knows what the exact number is," Wilson said. "It has definitely been going on for at least 70 or 80 years."

The festivities will officially begin at 6 p.m. Thursday with a parade, which will start at Manhattan Town Center and travel down Poyntz Avenue to City Park.

A pedal-tractor pull for kids ages 4-12 will follow the parade at Hurlburt Hall in Cico Park. Contestants will use their own power to drive a pedal tractor pulling a weighted skid. Every contestant receives a prize, and the winner in each age group will be eligible to compete at the Kansas State Fair in September.

Ottaway Amusements will provide carnival entertainment every evening. Wristbands for one unlimited evening of rides can be purchased for $20.

"There are lots of things to do," Wilson said. "There will be rides, food and live entertainment every night."

The second-annual Riley County Idol event will allow amateur entertainers to showcase their talents. There is a $100 cash prize for four age groups. Competitors will take the stage at 7 p.m. Saturday.

Along with Riley County Idol, the Kaw Valley Rodeo will provide entertainment for rodeo fans with nightly performances starting at 8 p.m. July 24-26 in Wells Arena at CiCo Park.

Other events at this year's fair include Military Family Night, which will begin with a free picnic at 6 p.m. Thursday in CiCo Park. Military personnel and their families will also receive free admission to the rodeo on Thursday.

In a special addition to traditional fair food, the Blue Valley Pork Producers will also serve barbecue from 5 to 7 p.m. Friday at the Pottorf Hall Patio.

Returning for the third consecutive year is Fair Factor, a competition with 10 teams of five individuals who compete in challenges until a winner is crowned. The contest starts at 2 p.m. Saturday in Hurlburt Arena.

"[Fair Factor] is really hilarious to watch," Wilson said. "There is really something for everyone at the fair."

Gadgets gone wild

iPhone reveals generational obsession, emptiness of consumption lifestyle

Buyers rushed to Apple stores on July 11 to wait in long lines for the third generation iPhone.

YEGOR SOROKIN

Those long lines were not created by consumers' overwhelming need for Apple's newest baby. Instead, problems during activation of the phone contributed significantly to waiting time for those in line, according to CNN.

Despite ongoing problems that stem back to the release of the original iPhone, Apple managed to build a brand that is perceived as something new and different and thus unexplainably desirable.

At the beginning of its personal computer era, Apple's computers were selling in considerably lower numbers than their PC competitors.

MacBooks and iPods now seem to outnumber their rivals, and all these products still have that all-important yet ironic air of individuality. iPhones are everywhere and Apple is winning, as more people start rushing to stores with the famous fruit logo as they think, "If everybody has an iPod or iPhone, why don't I?"

Owning these gadgets can generate sweet feelings of belonging to a certain group, which certainly promotes sales. Feeling lonely or lost? Go to an Apple store, stand in line for a couple of hours, and feel like part of a true community centered on new technology.

Some believe chicks dig the iPhone, while others try to impress the world by being cool and obviously checking e-mail on their glamorous iPhone.

Then again, there are those who get the device's full benefits, using it as a phone, music player and personal organizer.

However, the iPhone does not provide the increase in productivity that most expect. It might increase the speed of communication, but not necessarily the quality.

Don't forget that the iPhone is still bound to iTunes and, as always, is tied to a contract with AT&T. Despite its relatively low initial price, if you take into account fees you will need to pay during a two-year period, the iPhone does not appear to be such a good deal anymore. It should come as no surprise that Apple competitors have already designed many alternatives.

I still do not understand the buzz regarding the iPhone. It just does not deserve the attention it is getting. You can actually find all those features in other models – you just need to invest some time searching and making comparisons.

People today just seem to be too lazy to look around. Even the youth feel more comfortable consuming than saving and producing.

The iPhone is the symbol of my generation: Many advancements here and there, but no real steps forward. Prosperity comes from increases in productivity, which could be attained only by accumulation of capital. Success is hard work today and delayed consumption until tomorrow, not consumption today and hard work sometime in the future.

The current generation of younger Americans live mainly on the savings of their parents. We buy shiny gadgets but have no core, which is the true cause of the downturn in the economy and the emptiness of our material culture.

Yegor Sorokin is a graduate student in mathematics. Please send comments to opinion@spub.ksu.edu.

Americans should keep current domestic troubles in perspective

In Zimbabwe, $100 billion won't even buy you a loaf of bread. This is because $100 billion in Zimbabwe is the equivalent of just one U.S. dollar.

JESSICA HENSLEY

And we thought our economy was bad.

According to a report on CNN.com, the new $100 billion banknotes were introduced about a week and a half ago by Zimbabwe's central bank as a desperate bid to salvage the country's ailing economy.

The official inflation rate in the once-prosperous country is now 2.2 million percent.

Much of our nation's focus lately has been on the rising costs of gas and food at home. We have not been paying much attention to the rest of the world, except maybe a few glances at the seemingly never-ending conflicts in the Middle East.

It is easy to become so enthralled with America's own problems, with regular unleaded gas costing nearly $4 a gallon these days. As the prices of food, fuel and clothing continue to rise, it is easy to think only of our own troubles.

We should try to keep issues in perspective, though. After all, we are not the only ones struggling to keep our balance in a rapidly changing world.

According to a July 9 online story from Time Magazine, five peacekeepers from a joint United Nations/African Union force were killed, and 17 more were missing after being ambushed that same day.

That peacekeeping force has been on the ground in Sudan for some time now, attempting to end the genocide which has taken the lives of more than 300,000 people.

On another continent, the sex-slave industry in Russia continues to thrive, according to CNN.com. Thousands of girls and young women are forced into prostitution every year. Though Russian authorities acknowledge the problem, they are ill-equipped to deal with it.

Meanwhile, Tropical Storm Dolly hovers off the coast of Mexico and prepares to make landfall on the southern Texas coast with winds of 75 miles per hour.

We are lucky to be in the U.S. Even with all the challenges we are facing, we must acknowledge that there are many in this world who have it far worse than we do.

Christina Klein | COLLEGIAN

The whole world is in a constant state of upheaval, and while it might seem like we are getting the worst of it at times, it is important to remember how sheltered most of us truly are.

The world is changing and we must adjust our lives accordingly. Complaining about the rising cost of living, while perhaps momentarily satisfying, is ultimately fruitless.

Rather than focusing on our own problems, which, in comparison to those of the rest of the world, are rather trivial, we should do more to help others. It is our responsibility as citizens in the of the world to consider the needs of others as well as the needs of ourselves.

Jessica Hensley is a sophomore in political science. Please send comments to opinion@spub.ksu.edu.

TO THE POINT

Hot times on campus

Summer is usually seen as a time for campus to rejuvenate after two long semesters, but it seems campus is as busy as ever. With its varied slate of science, journalism, music and basketball camps, among others, summer gives K-Staters a time to show off our campus. The Division of Facilities keeps the beautiful vegetation green even in these hot months, and K-State Student Union employees organize many large events without a full staff of their own.

TO THE POINT is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

When students see potential K-State students on campus, they should greet them with a Wildcat welcome. This is the time to prove how beautiful and friendly our university truly is. So, if there is trash, pick it up. If campers look lost, point them in the correct direction. Volunteer to talk to future students in your college or department. This is a great opportunity to talk to others about K-State's value.

Soon, the fall semester will bring swarms of students back to campus, but it is important for the few and proud summer students to stay K-State proud.

Adverse conditions cause K-State anglers to skip final weigh-in at national tourney

By Joel Aschbrenner
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

After two days of fishing in the Under Armour College Bass National Championship, which took place July 9-11 in Arkansas, a pair of anglers representing the K-State fishing team left the tournament without weighing in after facing adverse conditions.

The K-State fishing team, which has ten members, organizes and participates in four tournaments around Manhattan to determine which anglers will travel to national tournaments. Despite qualifying to represent the team at the tournament, Casey Smith, a recent graduate and former president of the K-State fishing club, and Jared Brooks, sophomore in biological and agricultural engineering, chose to leave early on the final day. There were 55 two-man teams competing in the tournament, which was televised nationally on ESPN.

The combination of a change in venue, difficult conditions and dangerous storms led Smith and Brooks to their decision.

The pair had two small fish they could have weighed, but they decided to skip the scales to get home in time for work.

"We could have hung around and weighed in those fish, but it would not have made that much of a difference," Smith said. "We were pretty far out of the lead.

Smith and Brooks said the other collegiate fishers participating in the national tournament also experienced setbacks, starting two weeks before the competition when flooding forced sponsors to move the tournament from the Arkansas River to Lake Maumelle.

"We were all set for the Arkansas River," Smith, who was competing in his fifth national tournament, said. "I fished it last year, and I think I had a pretty good idea of how to go back and catch fish this year."

Located outside Little Rock, Lake Maumelle is the city's water source and is cleared of all vegetation and debris.

"They don't allow brush piles or anything to be put in there, so there is no structure, and that's kind of how you figure out how you fish," Smith said.

The pair struggled to find fish throughout the two days of practice prior to competition, as clear water and intense sunshine drove fish to deep waters. When the tournament began, the pair continued searching for bass without much success.

The team said their hopes peaked on the first morning when they saw a storm moving in that could cool the air and provide conditions more conducive to reeling in big fish. But Brooks said the storm front brought more than just a drop in the temperature.

"We were getting ready to head down to a part of the lake where we had caught some fish while pre-fishing. As we were right in the middle of the lake,

Expanded federal loan programs offer students more financial aid

By Jenna Scavuzzo
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Two recent changes made to the federally guaranteed Stafford student loan program will give K-State students the opportunity to obtain additional financial assistance for the coming school year, said Larry Moeder, assistant vice president for student financial assistance and admissions.

The changes will allow the program to cover more educational expenses for students, Moeder said. The federal government decided to make the revisions in an effort to provide students with additional ways to receive financial assistance while in school, he said. The new program went into effect July 1.

The first change to the program increases unsubsidized federally guaranteed student loan eligibility by up to $2,000 for a typical undergraduate per academic year, Moeder said.

Most students who are considered "dependent" for student loans have a basic eligibility loan based on their year in school, he said. A student is determined as "dependent" after the financial assistance office acknowledges that the student's parents' income cannot support the student's educational expenses, Moeder said.

Freshmen can receive $3,500, sophomores could get $4,500 and juniors and seniors are eligible for $5,500 in loans. This has also been the basic plan for the past student loan program, but after the recent changes, students are eligible for an additional $2,000 per year, he said.

"Students can obtain this additional assistance by contacting financial aid and requesting the amount," Moeder said. "It's there if the student needs it. This will help lots of students and middle-income families."

The second change made to the program introduces a new repayment option for parents of dependent students borrowing under the Federal Parent PLUS (Parent Loans for Undergraduate Students) Loan program, Moeder said.

"Parents can generally borrow money under the Parent PLUS Loan program on behalf of the students," he said. "However, in the past, parents had to pay 60 days after the loan's disbursement. The new program allows parents to defer the pay on that loan until after their student's enrollment drops below a half-time basis, which is typically after the student has graduated. This makes it easier for parents to borrow money while their students are in school, and deal with the payment later."

Moeder said he thinks the new program will allow students to concentrate more on their studies and graduating on time, since so many students are forced to work part-time to cover academic expenses.

"One of the new program's greatest benefits is allowing students to not have to work so many hours during the school year and finish their degrees on time," Moeder said. "It can help relieve students' stress by covering more needed finances, which will let them devote more time to studying. This new program provides more assistance at a very critical time."

Along with changes to student loan programs, Moeder said the federal government has also created a grant for students who want to teach. K-State is participating in the Teacher Education Assistance for College and Higher Education (TEACH) grant program.

The TEACH grant can provide up to $4,000 annually in assistance to undergraduate and graduate students who agree to teach in an underserved field at a Title 1 school for four years, Moeder said. This includes teaching math, science or other high-need courses in low-income areas.

Moeder said he thinks this is a great opportunity for students who are sure they want to teach. If students do not fulfill

SUMMER BLOCKBUSTER

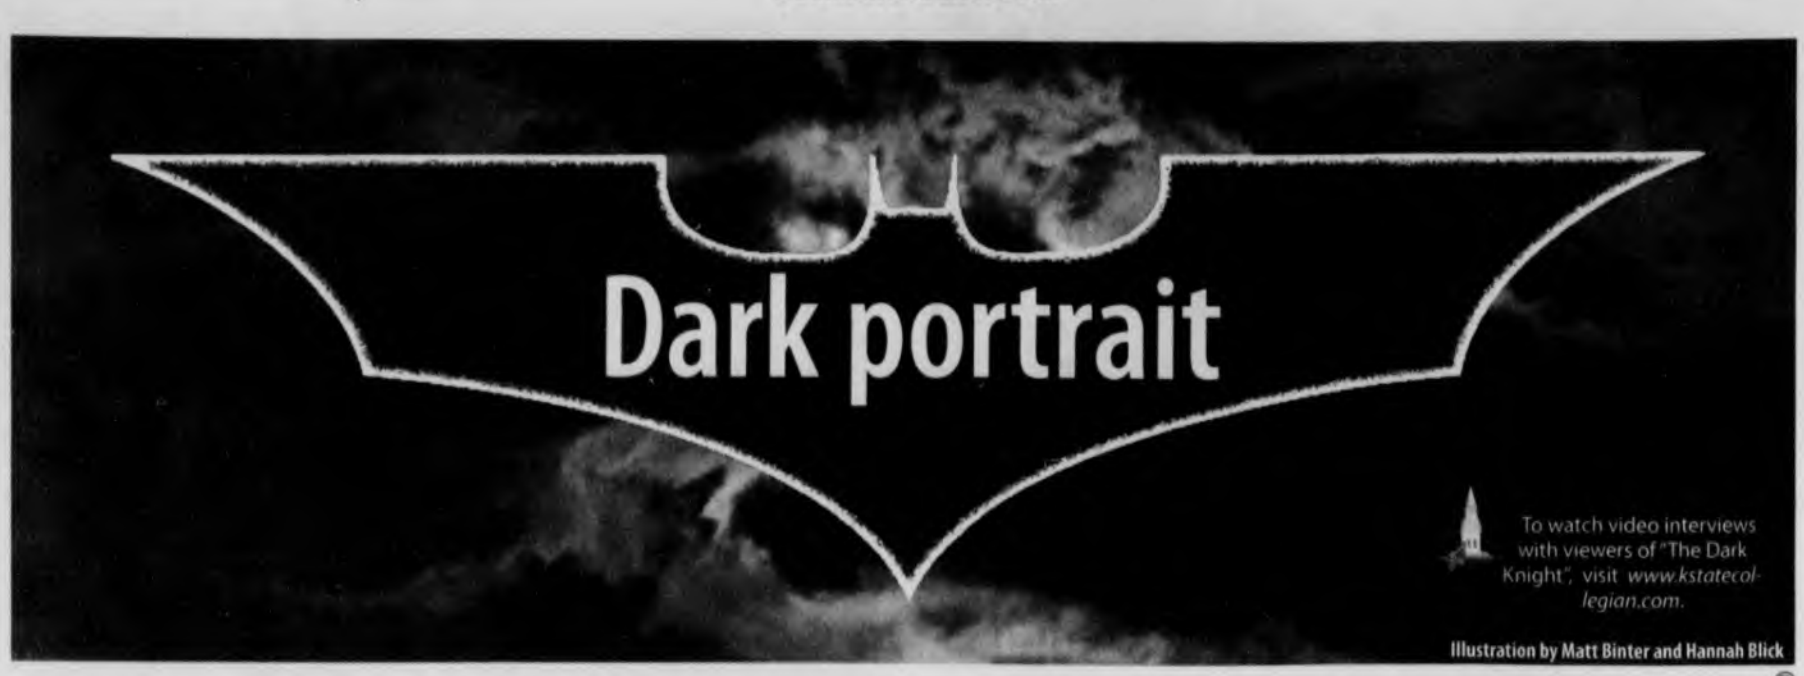

Illustration by Matt Binter and Hannah Blick

Latest installment of the 'Batman' series creates bold image with mad villians, raw action

"The Dark Knight"
Movie review by Brendan Praeger

Superhero movies provide the perfect mix of accessible plots, relatable characters, big-budget action scenes and instant fan bases to create the quintessential summer blockbuster. This summer, though, studios have pushed the market saturation of superheroes to the breaking point.

"The Incredible Hulk" and "Hancock" both turned out better than expected, and "Iron Man" and "Hellboy II" landed at the top of the genre, but "The Dark Knight," the sequel to "Batman Begins," now puts all other offerings to shame.

The hype surrounding "The Dark Knight" has made it nearly impossible to ignore. "Batman Begins" was one of the best-reviewed comic book adaptations in history and the reincarnation the franchise desperately needed. The untimely death of actor Heath Ledger added more fuel to the fire, as the movie includes his final complete performance.

After a record-setting number of midnight screenings on Friday, followed by truckloads of money at the weekend box office, it is safe to say that most people who care have already seen it for themselves. But for those who have not, rest assured that "The Dark Knight" is an absolute masterpiece.

The film begins with Gotham City's criminals with their backs against the figurative wall. Batman's vigilante justice forces them to turn to a mysterious new outlaw, The Joker, who promises to end their troubles by killing the Caped Crusader. Meanwhile, Harvey Dent, the new district attorney, fights crime in the courtroom. He also secures the affection of Rachel Dawes, Bruce Wayne's complicated love interest.

With multiple important plot lines, "The Dark Knight" takes a road seldom traveled in the comic book genre by focusing on other characters as often as the hero. Bruce Wayne's story is critical to the film's success, but The Joker and Harvey Dent prove to be equally important, if not more so. Even minor characters play crucial roles and scenes never feel wasted. While films like "Hancock" felt like they were written by a committee, writers Christopher and Jonathan Nolan were allowed to create something more complex. The brothers have collaborated on previous films, including "Memento" and "The Prestige," and it is a relief that they were not forced to temper the script for a wider audience.

Christopher Nolan also directs, reprising his duties from "Batman Begins." His taste for raw action and realistic stunts make the campy special effects of the '90s Batman movies seem like a farce. Deftly executed chase scenes and satisfying explosions help complete the summer blockbuster checklist while reinforcing the idea that Gotham City's war puts all of its citizens in danger.

The movie puts a lot of pressure on its cast, and every actor rises to the challenge. Michael Caine, Morgan Freeman, Gary Oldman and Christian Bale all reprise their roles from "Batman Begins." Maggie Gyllenhaal takes over the role of Rachel Dawes, and greatly improves on Katie Holmes' original performance.

Aaron Eckhart plays Harvey Dent, a district attorney destined to become the criminal Two-Face. Any lingering memories of Tommy Lee Jones' cartoonish interpretation of the character will quickly be forgotten. The story takes the time to develop Dent's character before turning him into a villain, positioning him as Gotham's white knight, a symbol of hope that Batman can never be.

Despite the great ensemble cast, Heath Ledger's performance dominates the film. The Joker receives no back story, but instead fleshes out his madness over the course of the movie. Ledger's appearance is grotesque and haunting. Pasty makeup, grimy hair and a scarred smile mask him physically, but his mannerisms and voice help him truly disappear in the role. It would be naive to say Ledger's death has not added to the hype, but he is deserving of every ounce of praise he has received.

Fear, and the reaction to its influence, stands as the dominant theme in "The Dark Knight." The Joker plays the role of the terrorist, toying with Gotham City for his own amusement. He defies the idea that criminals are easy to understand, prompting the diagnosis that some men simply want to watch the world burn.

The response to terrorism provides the opportunity to raise numerous political questions, elevating the film's relevance to the world outside the cinema. While "Iron Man" took a stab at political themes, "The Dark Knight" cuts a little deeper. Questionable interrogation techniques, unauthorized surveillance and media influence all play roles in the progression of the plot. The allegories at play are thinly veiled, but they never come across as preachy or didactic. "The Dark Knight" raises questions, but it never explicitly answers them.

"The Dark Knight" goes above and beyond expectations in nearly every category. It is not simply a great comic book movie – it transcends its genre. If you have not had the chance to see "The Dark Knight" yet, waste no more time. As for me, I'll be paying it the ultimate compliment: seeing it again.

Bat Legend on the silver screen

Before "Batman Begins" took the franchise back to square one, four films had sculpted the modern version of Bruce Wayne's legend. Here's a rundown of the series' often embarrassing history through the past two decades.

"Batman" (1989)
Directed by Tim Burton

Michael Keaton stepped into the rubber suit, and Jack Nicholson created what, until now, has been the definitive version of The Joker. Loosely based on Frank Miller's graphic novel "The Dark Knight Returns," "Batman" remained the best in the series until "Batman Begins."

"Batman Returns" (1992)
Directed by Tim Burton

Keaton reprised his role, and was joined by Danny DeVito as the Penguin, Christopher Walken as Max Shreck and Michelle Pfeiffer as Catwoman. The film is cheesy, but relatively painless to watch. Pfeiffer in a leather suit should be enough to please male viewers.

"Batman Forever" (1995)
Directed by Joel Schumacher

Val Kilmer's Batman faces Jim Carrey's Riddler and Tommy Lee Jones' Two-Face while adding Chris O'Donnell as his sidekick, Robin. It also debuted Batman's new suit, which featured rubber nipples.

"Batman & Robin" (1997)
Directed by Joel Schumacher

George Clooney takes the lead role in Batman's most ridiculous outing. Villians include Arnold Schwarzenegger's Mr. Freeze, Uma Thurman's Poison Ivy and Jeep Swenson's Bane. Alicia Silverstone also joins the cast as Batgirl. If lame one-liners from the Governator and a complete black hole of sincerity and coherence constitute your idea of an entertaining film, "Batman & Robin" might be right up your alley.

"Batman Begins" (2005)
Directed by Christopher Nolan

Timid, angry Bruce Wayne turns his fear of bats into the symbol that strikes fear into the hearts of Gotham's criminals. We see the murder of Bruce's family, the years he flew under the radar and the years he spent with Ra's al Ghul and the League of Shadows. The film ends with Batman's first major victory against crime and the introduction of the Joker, his next great foe.

TRAVEL TALES

Students' summer trips offer cultural insights, relaxation

For the first 21 years of my life, my summers consisted of couch vegetation and extended bike rides. This summer, however, I traded those habits for plane tickets and tanks of gas.

My summer travels have already taken to me to Kansas City, Mo., down the mighty Kansas River, and as far north as New York. Next weekend I'm going to Lubbock, Texas.

There is something about seeing new places that stimulates my intellect. I just would not be able to consider myself a well-rounded person if I only experienced cultures within 10 minutes of home.

The last time I traveled this much was my sophomore year of high school. I lived in Israel that year and saw as much as I could afford.

When I moved back to the U.S., I thought it would be possible to take a trip anywhere within the states. But I was wrong.

It is just as easy to get in a car and drive from Manhattan to Denver as it is to get in a car and drive from Tel Aviv, Israel to Cairo, Egypt.

With all my trips, there are a few negative aspects of traveling most people do not enjoy. It is often difficult for people to get away.

Work, school – we get so busy it's hard to pull ourselves away. But more often than not, we need those breaks to refresh our minds and bodies and start another school year.

Another downfall to traveling is the amount of money you typically spend. I often hear people say they do not want to take a vacation because of the costs. However, the saying goes; You can not make an omelet without cracking some eggs.

The same is true with traveling. You cannot have a good time unless you are willing to shell out some dough. The key is to pick your battles – choose to fly, perhaps, but then stay with friends instead of getting a hotel room. Or you could pack some Kraft Easy Mac rather than eat out for every meal.

Just do not forget that spending a little of your cash frivolously can make your trip more memorable.

When I visited New York City last weekend, I discovered that vendors charge $8.50 for a beer at Yankee Stadium. But I ended up buying a few and enjoyed my trip that much more.

The third, and what I believe to be the most important, aspect of traveling is participation. In other words, do as much as you can reasonably do, while still allowing yourself time to reboot.

Last Saturday, I saw countless New York City sights like the Brooklyn Bridge, the Statue of Liberty and the Empire State Building, simply because my family and I were not afraid to get out there and travel around the city looking for adventure.

So, don't let time, money or passiveness stop you from traveling and experiencing life. You'd better hurry, though, because summer 2008 is almost over, and then it's back to the books for all of us.

State experts see hope for improvement at environmental sustainability talks

By Whitney Hodgin
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The third-annual Dialogue on Sustainability, which was designed to share knowledge and promote networking between Manhattan citizens and sustainability experts, took place on Thursday at the K-State Alumni Center.

The dialogue was sponsored by the Consortium for Environmental Stewardship and Sustainability, K-State director of sustainability Ben Champion and other partners.

Speakers included state representatives and state and campus leaders in the field. They focused on ways K-State can increase sustainability on the micro- and macro-levels.

"K-State has an effective reach in Kansas that is very valuable," Champion said. "We need to educate more students about sustainability to effect a change in policy."

Dan Nagengast, executive director of the Kansas Rural Center, said that Kansas is not as advanced as other states like Minnesota, Iowa, Colorado and Arkansas in terms of sustainability during a panel on wind energy.

"We're right in the middle of where the wind resource is. We need to get in on that and invest in wind power," he said.

Attendees went on tours of the K-State Rain Garden, the Willow Lake Student Farm, the UFM solar addition and the home of Elaine and Bob Mohr, who use sustainability practices in their home garden.

Rep. Ronnie Metsker, R-Overland Park, said the issue should be depoliticized for the sake of appealing to legislatures responsible for passing or denying policy changes necessary for advancement.

"Even though we sit on opposite sides of the aisle, Tom Hawk and I have agreed on several issues including sustainability," Metsker said.

Champion facilitated a panel on sustainability initiatives and opportunities at K-State like recycling and energy efficiency. He provided examples of changes that could be made using bio-diesel rather than grease in campus dining centers, and recycling at Snyder Family Stadium.

Rep. Tom Hawk, D-Manhattan, said a comprehensive strategic plan is needed to avoid wasting any more time.

"Are we on the Titanic rearranging deck chairs, or do we still have a chance?" Hawk said.

International Buddies participants create friendships without borders

By Summer Allen and Hannah Blick
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Imagine living in a foreign country where no one understands what you are saying, let alone your culture. People stare at you because your looks and styles are different from almost everyone else, and it suddenly becomes difficult to accomplish even the simplest of tasks, like mailing a letter or finding your way to class.

These are realities international students face every day at K-State.

However, K-State's International Buddies program is available to help students from foreign countries cope with the culture shock that comes with studying abroad, said assistant administrator coordinator Leah Peppiatt, who has been involved with the program since this spring.

The program, located in the Office of International Programs, matches international students and their family members with K-State students and Manhattan community members who are U.S. natives. Peppiatt said the pairs are asked to meet once a week to get to know each other and learn more about each other's cultures.

Connie Huang and Stacy Simon met through the International Buddies program. The program helps international students improve their English skills and helps all students involved learn about other cultures.

GETTING INVOLVED

Stacy Simon, junior in hotel and restaurant management, said she has been involved with the International Buddies program since October 2007.

FISHING | Lightning, broken line prohibit higher finish for local pair

it got dark, and you could tell rain was coming and it just started downpouring," Brooks said. "The wind picked up quite a bit and it started lightning. We actually took a couple waves into the boat."

When lightning struck only a few hundred feet away from the pair, they headed to the marina to wait out the storm, Smith said.

Smith and Brooks said they had better luck on the second day and landed several fish, two of which would have been large enough to weigh in at the tournament. Brooks said they caught all the fish in the mouth of a river that provided rare vegetation in the otherwise bare lakebed.

Unfortunately, Brooks lost a fish that could have topped all the others.

"I hadn't had a fish in two days, then on my first cast, I throw in, hook a fish and it starts taking drag and it breaks my line. I never got a chance to see it, but maximally, it could have been five pounds," he said.

If they had weighed in their two fish, Smith and Brooks could have moved up eight or nine spots, and if he had landed the fish that snapped his line, they could have finished 10 or 15 spots higher, Brooks said.

A DAY AT FORT RILEY

Photos by Nathaniel LaRue | COLLEGIAN

Soldiers of the U.S. Army's 1st Infantry Division gather for morning physical training as dawn breaks Thursday at Fort Riley, "Home of the Big Red One."

Spending 2 days with Fort Riley medics emphasizes seriousness of deployment preparations

By Rebecca Bush
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Headlights give them away.

As they make their way from their homes and barracks to morning physical training, post is quiet except for the chirping of insects. Only a row of bright beams sneaking along the winding roads signal the beginning of another day at Fort Riley.

Singing about "dawn's early light" might evoke patriotism for many Americans, but the soldiers of the U.S. Army's 1st Infantry Division begin their days long before the sun comes up.

Each soldier's day has a different rhythm. Medics spend their days and weeks balancing the work of a health care specialist, providing basic medical care and a combat medic, working under intense pressure. The medics of Special Troops Battalion, 2nd Brigade Combat Team, said their days are like roller-coasters, changing momentum without warning – which is just how they like it.

THURSDAY 5:30 A.M.

Sgt. 1st Class Billy Mitchell arrives to open the brigade's aid station for sick call. He speaks to a building guard and heads into the station, which is located in a former weapons storage room. A desk, some chairs, and several shelving units of supplies and records fill the room. Temporary walls create two makeshift exam rooms.

The station serves all members of the 2nd Brigade for any basic injuries or illnesses. One physician assistant and 11 medics take turns assessing soldiers and prescribing treatment Monday-Friday. If patients need to have X-rays, pick up prescriptions or receive treatment from a doctor, they are sent to the Consolidated Troop Medical Clinic. Irwin Army Community Hospital is also available for emergencies.

The aid station is almost empty this morning, with several medics on leave and no patients. Spc. John Flores and Spc. Billy O'Neal trade friendly jabs in the back of the room while checking supplies and talking with visitors. O'Neal, who goes by "Big Country," repacks the medic aid bags, which weigh 30-40 pounds each, while Flores demonstrates how tampons are used to stuff bullet holes.

A commotion at the door grabs the men's attention. Two soldiers in PT uniforms have come in, one supporting the other, who is slumped to one side and shaking violently. Flores and Mitchell ask him questions, coaching him to blink once for "yes" and twice for "no," and soon determine that though he wears a red bracelet denoting a morphine allergy, he had been given codeine at the hospital for his broken arm. The narcotic has caused him to go into anaphylactic shock, a serious but not life-threatening condition.

Mitchell asks one of the medics to drive the patient to the clinic across the street. Though vehicle traffic is forbidden in the area during morning PT, Mitchell hesitates only briefly before saying, "It's better to ask for forgiveness sometimes than for permission."

THURSDAY 9:40 A.M.

"Hey, guys, can you put my guts back in?"

The request, made with a smirk, warrants no attention from the six soldiers working on their casualty. This is Combat Lifesaver, a week-long program designed to teach non-medical soldiers the necessary skills to keep an injured comrade alive in the field until they can be seen by a medic or taken to a hospital, and though stress is high, the stakes are less than life and death.

Flores explains that there are two main phases of care taught in CLS training. Care Under Fire involves finding a casualty in the line of fire, applying a tourniquet to stop bleeding and carrying the soldier to a semi-protected area. Tactical Field Care begins then, and bandages, IVs and chest decompressions are the focus. The goal is to rescue a soldier, radio for a helicopter and have the wounded person ready to go in 20 minutes, a scenario that is the focus of today's class.

There will be a more intensive training session Friday, but today's light practice seems to be getting the better of several of the soldiers.

"Oh, the things I'm seeing," O'Neal says as he covers his eyes and shakes his head.

Though these soldiers will not deploy until October, they will receive refresher lessons from the battalion's medics until then. The class is taught by ex-military civilians, but Flores and O'Neal have been observing this week so they can teach the class in Iraq during the 12 months the battalion will be there.

Only one of the unit's medics has been deployed to Iraq before, and that was five years ago. Sgt. Nakia Wilson has little to say about the specifics of the experience, but he does not mince words about what it meant to him.

"Before I went, I took the States for granted. Now, I don't."

FRIDAY 10:30 A.M.

Shots from unseen shooters whistle by soldiers as they run to their fallen comrades by an Army helicopter. After securing the injured troops on stretchers, they race across a field, through a large metal tube and over a barrier to safety.

The ammunition is paintballs, the field is full of mud instead of sand, and the helicopter is a disabled Vietnam-era Huey, but as a substitute for Operation Iraqi Freedom, this CLS training exercise has the running and yelling down pat.

"What do you need to do first? Think, use your heads!" screams Melinda Whitney, trainer and facilitator at the Medical Simulation Training Center. Soldiers rush into a dark, smoke-filled room and start working on their casualties, who have arm and chest wounds, as well as double leg amputations. The victims today are not fellow soldiers, but computerized dummies who breathe, blink and bleed. Trainers monitor the soldiers' work through cameras and adjust the dummies' responses according to the quality of care they receive.

O'Neal and Flores hover around the two five-person teams, pushing those who are hesitant or waiting for help and shouting reminders to those who move too fast.

"Just slow down for a minute and think. What's going to kill him first?" O'Neal says, frustration evident in his voice. "Put the tourniquet on first – don't worry about the bandages now."

"I cannot believe no one has decompressed his heart," Flores says as he stalks around his group. "Get an IV in. Oh, it's dark and you can't see? Too bad. How many times do you have guaranteed light in Iraq?"

Whitney continues her yelling, providing help and derision in the same breath. At the announcement that the medical helicopter has landed, the training soldiers rush out of the room, sweat pouring off their faces, leaving the medics to assess the work they still have to do.

According to a March 24 article on www.medicalnewstoday.com, over ninety percent of soldiers injured in Iraq survive, and O'Neal and Flores say training like this is the main reason why, making their reinforcement sessions even more important.

"This is the basic stuff they need to know so they can save their buddy until we can get to them and do our job," Flores says. "We just have to keep working with them and practicing over and over until it's automatic and they won't freeze up under pressure."

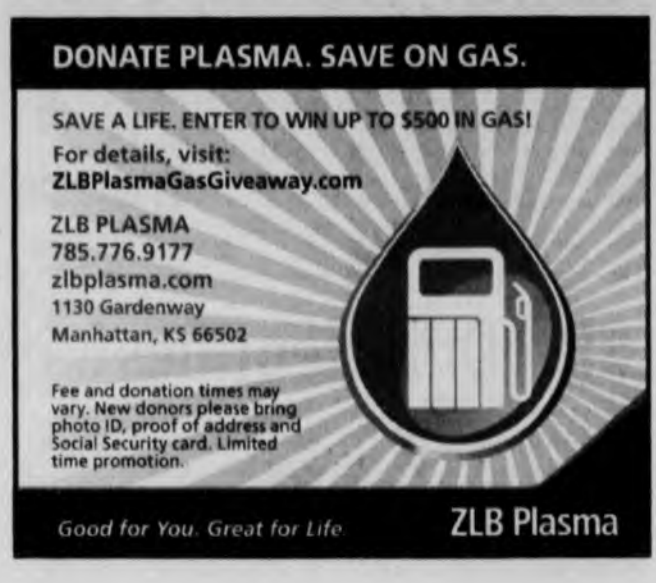
Flores, who previously deployed to Afghanistan, bases his teaching philosophy on a poignant mix of common sense and self-preservation.

"[Non-medical soldiers] need to be able to do this work in the field, because if I'm running around out there trying to help everyone, I'll probably get hurt and then everyone will be screwed," he says. "Plus, I'm going to teach them everything I can, because if I get hurt, I want the people taking care of me to know what they're doing."

He glances at his comrades and lifts his chin a little.

"I mean, I don't know about anyone else, but I'm planning on coming home."

Members of the 2nd Brigade Combat Team, 1st Infantry Division, move themselves and a practice mannequin over a barrier during training Friday morning at the Fort Riley Medical Simulation Training Center. The exercise was the final test of Combat Lifesaver, a training program that prepares non-medical soldiers to give basic treatment to injured troops during combat.



Soldiers in a Combat Lifesaver session practice putting an IV in a classmate Thursday morning at Fort Riley. Participants learned several skills during the week, including chest decompression, wound bandaging, airway management and tourniquet application.

about 20 percent of its visitors from out of the state of Kansas," Carmichael said. "We are still conducting research and trying to find out if these numbers are attainable."

Richard Woollacott, vice president of Hilferty and Associates, said the Discovery Center could be very different from a traditional museum.

"It's a discovery center," Woollacott said. "The content of the exhibits are still completely open and can be very interactive and hands-on. The best facility is one that tells a good story."

ance. "We also talked about potential scenarios we would want to be prepared for in looking toward planning a full-scale drill."

Johnson said emergency crews responding to the BRI in Pat Roberts Hall have a different experience than those going to a normal office suite. If the responders are entering a containment area, HAZMAT suits and protective breathing devices must be worn. During the walk-through, Johnson and her team found weak communication signals in some of the highest containment areas of the building. She said she hopes the radio communication will be as ideal as it can be in the next 3-4 weeks.

"First responders are not always allowed into the laboratory unless you had a serious spinal injury," she said. "So most likely, you will have co-workers trained on how to get the victim out so you don't have a contamination concern. Part of this walk-through helped us look through more specific logistic details, like how to get a person quickly out of the building."

She also said the BRI has to have specific plans because employees would not want first responders to injure themselves in the containment area or endanger the outside community.

"People in the community seem to have concerns with having infectious diseases in the community. people to know that there are lots of regulations forcing us to prepare for any kind of incident and we are members of the community and I am just as concerned as my next-door neighbor," she said.

The BRI is hoping to start Level-2 research at the end of 2008, which involves non-airborne organisms like salmonella. After meeting all the safety requirements, the institute will eventually become a full-scale Level-3 research center, which means the facility will be able to study organisms transported through the air.

the teaching agreement after graduation, they must repay the grants as loans with unsubsidized interest.

Moeder said K-State has e-mailed the changes in the program to all students who have been admitted to the university, and that any student can qualify for a student loan.

Some students said they have not yet noticed a difference in how much money they will be receiving for this year. Other students, however, said they know how much the expanded loan program will offer.

"This new loan program helps me tremendously," Travis Stuewe, junior in economics, said. "I was $1,500 in debt the last two semesters, and this makes everything much easier for me this next coming semester."

MANHATTAN EMERGENCY SHELTER

A place to call home

Photos by Matt Binter | COLLEGIAN

The Manhattan Emergency Shelter is currently located at 831 Leavenworth St., but the house can no longer meet clients' growing needs. The shelter's new home is being built at 416 S. Fourth St. When the building is finished, it will be able to accommodate more clients in more updated surroundings than the current facility.

Despite delays, new emergency shelter plans to open next month

By Salena Strate
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Had the new Manhattan Emergency Shelter been open last week, more than 40 beds in the facility would now be full. Instead, the shelter is having to turn more and more people away.

The shelter will be getting a new home, but not soon enough for some. The plan was to move everything to the new building by Friday, but construction delays and weather hindrances are pushing the dates back even further.

"At one point we had three houses, so we really were able to spread everything that we keep out," said Mandy Chapman Semple, executive director of the shelter. "Now, we are down to just [one house] and a storage unit. So, you see stuff everywhere, and every nook and cranny is full."

Emily Wagner, client service director, said the shelter was turning many people away in June because its current location could not handle the growing need in Manhattan.

"We just don't have the space," Wagner said.

Semple said the new plan calls for the shelter's staff to move into the new location on Aug. 15, with clients being able to stay by the end of August. The shelter will never close during the transition.

Shelter workers are planning a grand opening with facility tours in the middle of September. The new building, located at 416 S. Fourth St., will be named for the project's largest donor, whose name has not yet been released.

The original plans for the new shelter included a parking lot. However, flooding issues surfaced after heavy rains in June, postponing construction and forcing workers to revamp the lot.

Semple said as the downtown redevelopment project progresses, construction drainage issues will improve.

"What we are building is a different type of structure, because it's really an extremely large residence, although it has a lot of commercial applications," Semple said. "So, it has been a challenge to find that balance between institutional usage and a residential feel."

The new shelter will have a maximum occupancy of 47 people. Three separate wings for men, women and families will give the shelter more organizational options. The family rooms also have dividers, which can be used to separate the room, depending on the size of the family, Wagner said.

"For the most part, we are turning away large families that we don't have room for," she said. "Also, we will be able to accommodate two individuals who have disability needs."

Semple said there is a lot of psychology that goes into moving into a shelter. Society in general believes situations are better when people have roofs over their heads, she said.

However, when families are caring for developing children, simple items like colored bedspreads can also be helpful.

"If we are going to the trouble of building a new facility, then we also want to raise the standards from what we expect from ourselves as an agency and what we are providing for our clients – that changes then what our clients can expect," Semple said. "We are changing the way we do things. Beds will be made when clients come into the rooms. It says to the clients that things are going to be OK."

Andrea Istas, volunteer donation coordinator at the shelter, said when clients go upstairs at the current location, all they see are white walls.

At the new location, families will have full-sized beds, and the rooms will be more welcoming. Istas also said the shelter will be changing the way volunteer hours are organized.

Semple said she encourages students to volunteer at the new location when it is fully operational.

"The design and the way the facility will function really allows and requires us to have a great volunteer program," she said. "It's really designed for students to learn about how a non-profit organization works."

VOLUNTEER WITH THE SHELTER

The Manhattan Emergency Shelter will be moving from 831 Leavenworth St. to 416 S. Fourth Street soon. Workers will be needed to help set up clients' rooms, moving items from one building to another and run other general errands.

Volunteers can help from 9 a.m. to 8 p.m. between Aug. 4 and Aug. 30.

Skill sets needed include administrative and organizational support, construction and home maintenance and transportation.

To help, call the Manhattan Emergency Shelter at 537-3113.

Campus road to close for construction

Mid Campus Drive will be closed from Anderson Avenue to Kedzie Hall from 5 a.m. to noon Friday, said Jack Carlson, project manager for facility planning.

That part of the road will be blocked off so concrete pumps can have easier access to the parking garage. Carlson said this process will happen about every other week from now until all the concrete is applied.

Drivers are encouraged to avoid this area and use alternate routes while the street is blocked.

Barricades will be set up and workers will help direct traffic. Bad weather could prolong the closure into the afternoon, Carlson said.

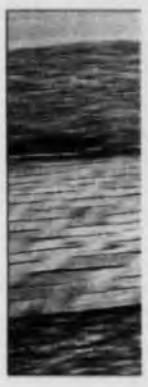
MOVING TIPS

PREPARE TO PACK



-Before you delve into the daunting task of packing up everything you own to move, set aside enough time so you can go through everything at a relaxed pace. Also, be sure to have plenty of boxes, packing tape, scissors and markers on hand to help the process go smoothly.

DOWNSIZE

-While you are packing for your move, whether it is across campus or across the state, take a few minutes to set aside what you do not need. Decluttering your belongings and throwing out or donating items you do not need is a great way to rid yourself of stress and cut down on moving costs.

UPDATE ADDRESS

-Leave plenty of time to set up your electric, gas, cable and any other services or utilities you need switched before you move into your new place. Also, make sure you update your address on iSIS so all your K-State mail will be sent to the correct address.

CAMPUS ERRANDS

REGISTER YOUR BIKE

-Don't forget to get your bicycle registered at Parking Services in Edwards Hall at no charge. This will also help police locate your bike if it is stolen. If your bike has no serial number, call University Police at 785-532-6412 and arrange to have it marked so it can be identified and registered.

BUY BOOKS, PAY TUITION

-Before the masses of students swarm Manhattan for the beginning of the fall semester, be sure to stop by Varney's, the K-State Student Union Bookstore or Claflin Books and Copies to pick up your textbooks. Also, it might be a good idea to stop at the cashier's office in Anderson Hall to pay your tuition before Aug. 15.

KNOW YOUR SCHEDULE

-Take advantage of the next few weeks before life gets too hectic to plan your weeks and know your schedule. Re-familiarize yourself with iSIS and make sure you know where all of your classes are before the first day of school.

With a few trees here and some power washing there, the K-State campus has gradually regained a sense of normalcy after the June 11 tornado, and university officials said workers' efforts will result in all buildings being ready for classes by the start of the fall semester.

Bruce Shubert, associate vice president for administration and finance, said the clean-up effort has shifted from securing buildings temporarily to fixing them permanently.

"Our immediate goal was to make the buildings safe and weather-tight," he said. "That's where you saw workers removing debris and boarding up windows. Now we're making progress with permanent repairs."

In addition to debris removal and window replacement, Division of Facilities workers have been making roof repairs and fixing heating and ventilating units, and Shubert said all campus buildings are ready for students.

"Except for a couple rooms in Weber [Hall], all rooms and spaces are usable," he said.

Shubert said most work will be done before school starts, with only a few projects taking longer. The passageway between Durland and Fielder Halls in the Engineering Complex sustained extensive structural damage and will not be finished for a few months. Shubert emphasized, however, that the buildings would be open and classes would proceed as normal during construction.

The nuclear reactor in Ward Hall, which has been secure since the night of the tornado, currently has a metal skin on it and more permanent protection will be installed soon, Shubert said.

"It may not be replaced by the time school starts, but it's on order and should be here shortly," he said.

Another important aspect of the campus clean-up has been more aesthetic than structural. Planting 25 trees in a high-traffic area on Claflin Road has improved campus morale, President Jon Wefald said.

"[The trees] are just to show we're ready to go when students come back, that we're still here," he said.

Wefald said out of approximately 5,000 trees on campus, 150 were lost from storm damage. Though summer is not the typical time to plant trees, the administration wanted to replace trees in a visible area to demonstrate how much progress has been made and to make the storm's damage less noticeable, he said.

To help remove small debris from campus buildings, Wefald arranged for 69 buildings to be power washed.

Batman's reliance on own assets makes him "everyman" superhero

YEGOR SOROKIN

Here comes the question of the century: Who would win in a battle between Batman and Spiderman?

I cheer for Batman. He is the best superhero we have ever seen and ever will see, and he will always win a fight against Spiderman.

Let's start with money: Bruce Wayne is rich, while Peter Parker is a student who becomes a teacher.

With all that money, Batman could compile a network of spies that would find Spiderman and monitor all his steps. Having Spider Sense is nice, but having a ton of money is better. After all, Batman does not need to fight with Spiderman personally – he can just hire a whole posse of assassins. Even if Spiderman survived the attacks of these hired professionals, I am willing to bet he would be significantly weakened. Thus, all Batman needs to do is deal the final blow.

Who said superheroes should rely only on their superpowers and innate superhuman abilities? After all, Batman is one of the few superheroes who was not born with superpowers. Therefore, he is forced to use all the assets he has, including money.

It does not make him less worthy of recognition. That's how things work – you have to survive and use any available means, even though the public will not perceive your means as fair.

In fact, I'm proud of Batman. He can claim that he is a mere mortal with clean genes. He is flesh and bones, and I can identify with him. Spiderman is – let's be frank – a monster, the result of a freak accident.

Batman has a whole bunch of specialized bat-gadgets and vehicles. While Spiderman has his body and a limited selection of unrealistic devices, Batman could have virtually any Batcraft to enhance his strengths.

Who knows? Maybe a dozen years from now Batman will end up using some kind of robot to fight crime rather than sweat on the troubled streets of Gotham himself.

The bottom line is that Batman can increase his chances to win a fight with Spiderman by using external equipment, but Spiderman is in some sense limited by his own body and college student budget.

And oh yes – if things go badly for Batman, he can rely on his sidekick, Robin.

Though both men have troubles stemming from their childhoods, Batman seems to be in much better mental shape. He has wealth, many friends, several goals for his life and emotional fulfillment.

Spiderman suffers from lack of communication skills, he seems to accept mockery from his peers, he's broke and he has recurring problems with the opposite sex.

Now let me ask you: If this lovely pair of superheroes start exchanging insults on a battlefield, who is likely to become angry faster and lose mental balance? Take a wild guess.

Batman's suit is much more impressive than Spiderman's, and just look how it has transformed over the past few Batman movies. How can you be a superhero and wear red and blue tights instead of a black suit of armor? No villain will take you seriously unless you wear black.

Let me conclude with the following point: I sympathize with bats way more than spiders, especially radioactive ones. Bats are nice, spiders are scary. Bats eat spiders and that helps me with my fears. It is that feeling of safety that allows me to fall asleep rather that be afraid of spiders coming to my bed. That is why Batman has better control of Gotham City and is more appreciated by the citizens and city officials, not to mention children worldwide. Spiderman is less appreciated by the same group and seems to exist to be exploited by the local media in New York City in the classic comic book series.

Spiderman's superpowers give him true edge in superhero battles

JESSICA HENSLEY

It's the ultimate battle: superhero vs. superhero. Spiderman vs. Batman.

Here's the catch: Batman does not have superpowers and does not actually count as a superhero, making it more like superhero vs. guy with a cape.

It's a question we have all wondered about as we sat through sequel after vaguely interesting sequel.

The answer, if you have seen both the new Spiderman movies featuring Tobey Maguire, and the new Batman films featuring Christian Bale, is clear.

Spiderman would win, hands down.

The superhero scholars that frequent TheMovieInsider.com's message boards agree with me.

Reasons cited in a Spiderman vs. Batman thread include Spiderman's super strength, speed, agility, intelligence, and "Spidey Sense."

Batman is noticeably lacking in all of these areas because, as I mentioned earlier, he does not actually possess any true superpowers that can be used.

That's kind of vital to the whole superhero persona: the possession of superpowers.

Without them, Batman is less of a superhero and more of an eccentric rich guy who likes to dress up as a bat for fun and drive pimped-out tumblers.

As someone on the message board pointed out, anyone wearing a cape is just asking for it to get stuck in a door.

Man to man, Spiderman has all of the advantages. It's as simple as that.

Sure, an argument can be made for Batman's gadgets and stealthy – some would say underhanded – ways.

However, all of this is rendered irrelevant by Spiderman's superpowers. To even consider that a mere mortal like Batman could take on a real superhero like Spiderman is just a bit insane.

Consider, for example:

Spiderman can climb buildings using just his bare hands.

Batman would need mountaineering equipment or a helicopter.

Spiderman can lift upwards of 10 tons (as established by the Spiderman comic books). Batman cannot.

And who else can shoot webs from his wrists and use it to either capture foes or as a convenient form of travel? Batman just has a cool car.

In his defense, though, I am sure it has a killer sound system.

In the end, the answer to this epic question should be obvious.

Batman is a cool guy with a cool car and Christian Bale is definitely the guy for the part, but unfortunately, he is no match for Spiderman.

Putting on a cape and a funny hat does not a superhero make, no matter what those silly movies try to tell you.

When it comes to defending the innocent, Batman should leave the work to the real superheroes with real superpowers and play with his gadgets at home.

After all, it will not be Spiderman's fault if Batman gets hurt trying to take on more than he can handle.

Whatever superhero you grew up loving, there is still a case for all superheroes.

They have given children somethng to believe in and draw inspiration from for four decades – more than most fading idols over the ages – and all superheroes deserve to be considered great.

Spiderman, though, remains the best.

Editors share summer memories, Collegian late night deadline adventures

Salena Strate
EDITOR IN CHIEF
My advice for any K-State student: spend one summer in Manhattan before you graduate. Even though I pushed my staff and myself to work long hours in Kedzie Hall, I enjoyed my time walking across campus on sunny days. My favorite memory has to be a combination of all the Collegian production nights. I felt overwhelmed at times, but I liked knowing that I was the last one to look at 5,000 copies before they went to print. That was the highlight of my summer and maybe my entire Student Publications experience. Never will I forget this summer staff.

Hannah Blick
MANAGING EDITOR
This summer was full of interesting experiences, from concerts to road trips to bike rides, but I will never forget my first skydive, which I made this weekend. I have such a feeling of accomplishment after making two static line jumps and I hope to continue jumping and get my skydiving license.

Aubree Casper
OPINION EDITOR
My favorite summer memory was perhaps my most painful. During a family reunion at the beginning of the month, I decided to be brave and jump off a cliff at the Lake of the Ozarks. More than 30 feet, a black eye and a dark purple thigh later, I learned that keeping your legs straight can make an exhilarating experience even more fun!

This summer has been a crazy one for me, but through it all, the Collegian has been both the eye of the storm and the wind of the hurricane itself at different times. Though I cannot pick just one, my favorite summer memories would have to include dubbing our news editor "Hurricane Eric," living the "suite life" with Hannah and Salena at the Holiday Inn, relishing my first Collegian byline and enjoying plenty of quality "Berica" time with one of my best friends.

Sarah Rasmussen
EDGE EDITOR
The recurring theme of my summer has been: never a dull moment. Between my jobs at the Collegian and Bath and Body Works, I still found time to take a week-long vacation in Denver to visit my brother. It was a whirlwind week of sight-seeing, drag queens and more walking than I want to remember. Through it all, I found myself falling more in love with Denver every day I was there.

Eric Davis
NEWS EDITOR
Far and away, my favorite memory from the summer is the canoe trip on the Kansas River. I love doing things outside and getting paid for it is even cooler. My friends and I grew closer, I came away with a great page, and I learned a little more about the people I hang out with. I will never forget that day on the river.

PHOTO EDITOR
My favorite summer memory would definitely be skydiving for the first time. It is one of those things that I will never forget, one that gave me a story to tell for the rest of my life. I also liked going on the Kansas River float trip as well as covering Country Stampede. It was all just part of the perks of being a photographer: I get to go to places and events that I otherwise would not be able to.

Paul Kauffman
MULTIMEDIA/ONLINE EDITOR
This summer, I lived out of my fraternity house and in a house with my friends. One hot day, we were all sitting around and decided to go buy a small children's swimming pool. We sat in our "Family Center/Adult Lounge" for the entirety of Country Stampede. It was wild to see how many people we could fit into this tiny pool. I do love summers in Manhattan, though, and now I do not want school to begin. I will never forget all these memories.

Union solicits students' suggestions for recycling programs, sustainability

By Hannah Blick
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

When it comes down to it, K-State students really can make all the difference, said Tom Mahoney, marketing and sales manager of the K-State Student Union.

In an effort to improve sustainability at the Union, students have been asked to submit suggestions on how to increase recycling and raise sustainability awareness on campus, Mahoney said.

Four large, appropriately green-colored posters, located at the north end of the Union, immediately inside the doors from Bosco Student Plaza, ask students to e-mail their recycling ideas to unionpr@ksu.edu.

Besides simply e-mailing ideas, Mahoney said there are simple ways students can help the Union in its campaign to become more "Earth-friendly." For example, he said taking only one or two napkins at the Union Food Court and opting to not use a plastic straw and lid on paper fountain cups can help drastically cut down on waste.

Mahoney also said students can help out just by making the effort to throw plastic bottles and newspapers in the selected recycle bins.

"We can put up as many recycle centers and posters as we want, but until people decide to throw their cans and newspapers in them, there's not much else we can do. We need their cooperation to continue with this program," Mahoney said.

Bernard Pitts, assistant vice president and executive director of the Union, said though the Union is striving to improve its recycling and sustainability program, there has already been a solid program running for several decades.

"We recycle so much already – cardboard, light bulbs, batteries," he said. "I would like to see more recycling for white and colored paper."

The Union has also made several recent updates to improve its sustainability, according to Jack Connaughton, associate director of the Union. The automatic, three-step hand-washing stations located in the restrooms have helped ease water and paper waste, and with the help of campus privilege fees, the Union was able to replace its chilled water valves, which allows workers to have more control over various water sources in the building. All mechanical rooms are also currently undergoing updates to help save on energy.

"Most of what we've been doing are behind-the-scenes details," Connaughton said. "You might not see a whole lot happening, but it is."

Connaughton also said the Union is looking into switching to more environmentally-friendly custodial supplies; however, it would mean a 10-20 percent increase in costs. Pitts said the hindrance on most projects like this is usually the initial cost increase.

"Sustainability is still that catch-all word being thrown around, but not too much is being done," Pitts said. "Hopefully, as it becomes more universal, companies will be more competitive and costs will go down.

"Until then, is there an opportunity to receive funding from Student Government? Will customers be willing to pay that extra bit?"

The K-State Student Union is trying to improve recycling in the building. Union directors are accepting suggestions from students on ways to promote sustainability due to a current lack of participation in existing recycling programs.

Changes to sorority recruitment aim to make week more affordable, less stressful

Sorority recruits race in excitement down Todd Road on Bid Day of the Fall 2007 Recruitment week. This year's recruitment has been shortened by one day.

By Jenna Scavuzzo
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Changes are being made to sorority recruitment this year in an attempt to develop a stronger greek community and save students time and money, said Shawn Eagleburger, assistant director of Greek Affairs and Panhellenic Council adviser.

Greek Affairs employees, undergraduate students and chapter advisers decided to make several major changes to this fall's sorority recruitment, he said.

"Recruitment is the first day of the students' academic year," Eagleburger said. "Through making the changes we have, we are ensuring that all women going through and participating in recruitment have a better recruitment experience.

"Time and money is saved, and [changes] allows our greek community to operate more efficiently in less days. There was a record enrollment number this year, and the increasing number of participation is incredibly valuable."

This year, recruitment has been changed from a five-day to four-day process. In the past, women going through recruitment visited the 11 sororities on two separate days. On the first two days of the process, they would visit five sororities on one day and six on the other day. This year, women going through recruitment will visit all 11 on the first day, which will eliminate one day from the recruitment process, Eagleburger said.

"We're streamlining our process and better utilizing our resources given during recruitment," he said. "We're shaving off one day of recruitment, and allowing girls going through and existing members more time to enjoy family and friends back home and more time with their summer internships. It's a group benefit to see all the houses in one day."

Aside from saving time, the changes will save the greek community and those going

A DAY IN THE SKY

First-time jumper feels sense of accomplishment after static line skydive with KSU Parachute Club

Arch thousand ... 2,000 ... 3,000 ... Jerk! Before I could make it to 5,000, the painfully sharp pressure from the thick leg straps dug into my inner thighs and my body suddenly went limp as I started to descend slowly toward the earth.

As I continued falling, I tried to organize my thoughts and remember what it was I was supposed to be concentrating on: "Think, think! Turn and check the canopy ... it looks good. Only a few line twists, but they're unwinding themselves. OK, now reach for the brake toggles ..."

HANNAH BLICK

FIRST THOUGHT

When I first decided more than five years ago that I wanted to go skydiving, I can honestly say it was not a tough decision to make. I have never had a strong fear of heights or any qualms about jumping out of an airplane. In fact, the idea thrilled me. I also thought skydiving was a simple process, one that didn't require much time or dedication. It only took me one jump to realize how wrong I was.

FIRST IMPRESSION

I received my first taste of skydiving on Friday night when Matt Binter, sophomore in print journalism, Collegian photographer and fellow first-time skydiver, and I attended the static line class at Peters Recreation Complex, taught by two instructors from the KSU Parachute Club (KSUPC). The class went from 6 to 10 p.m., and I thought it might drag on.

Instead, it was full of valuable information and helpful jumping tips.

FIRST JUMP

The one thing no one tells you about skydiving is that it is quite a workout.

I made my first static line jump on Saturday afternoon, my second on Sunday, and by Monday morning, I was sore and sunburnt.

However, you usually do hear skydivers talk about their sense of pride and accomplishment, and that part is definitely true.

Not only did I learn how to fall from the sky and live, but I learned quite a bit, from the science of skydiving and how to position your body to work with the wind to how a parachute is intricately packed.

FIRST, BUT NOT THE LAST

As I landed my first static line skydive, I couldn't help but laugh out loud and fight the urge to jump up and down in pure delight.

The feeling of accomplishment overwhelmed me, and I wanted to get right back up there and go again.

I've been cleared to make my practice rip-cord pull jumps, and I can't wait to fall from an airplane again.

I only hope I don't get addicted – most skydivers I met this weekend freely admitted that they are hooked on the thrill.

Photos by Matt Binter and Nathaniel LaRue | COLLEGIAN

Jason "Captain Morgan" Purinton, skydiving instructor for the KSU Parachute Club, guides a skydiver to a safe landing on Saturday afternoon at the Wamego Municipal Airport. Several students jumped for the first time on Saturday after taking one of the KSUPC's parachuting static line classes, which are only offered six times a year.

KSU PARACHUTE CLUB

The KSU Parachute Club is one of the oldest collegiate skydiving clubs in the country. Members like to say it was founded in "1960-something" because there is a portion of cement at the club's airstrip at the Wamego Municipal Airport where an inscribed date has long since worn away, leaving only "196."

The club is comprised of mostly K-State students, but anyone who pays to make a jump is considered a member of the club. Only K-State students can serve as club officials.

For more photos and video of our reporters' first-time skydiving experiences, check out www.kstatecollegian.com. To set up a time to skydive with the KSUPC, visit www.skydivekstate.com.

PRICES

Because it is a non-profit organization, the KSUPC can offer its jumpers some of the cheapest skydiving prices in the U.S.

-Tandem jump: $170
-Static line class: $160
-Static line/Practice rip-cord pulls: $31 (4)
-First freefall: $5 (1)
-10-second delays: $26 (2)
-15-second delays: $26 (2)
-30-second delays: $32 (2-4)
-45-second delays: $36 (5-7)
(None include $5 for bag packer, if needed)

For more information on prices, dates and locations, e-mail the KSUPC at info@skydivekstate.com.

FIRST JUMP INFO

-A static line is a fixed cord attached to a stable latch in the airplane that pulls on and releases the main canopy of the parachute immediately after the skydiver exits the plane.

-To make a first static line jump, requirements include one four-hour class on Friday night, followed by two-three hours of ground training Saturday morning.

-First static line jumps are made from 3,500 feet.

Aubrey Gibson, junior in animal science and pre-veterinary medicine and licensed skydiver with the KSUPC, packs a parachute for a skydiving student inside one of the hangars at Wamego Municipal Airport on Saturday afternoon. Packing a parachute takes time, skill and patience and can only be done safely by a trained packer.

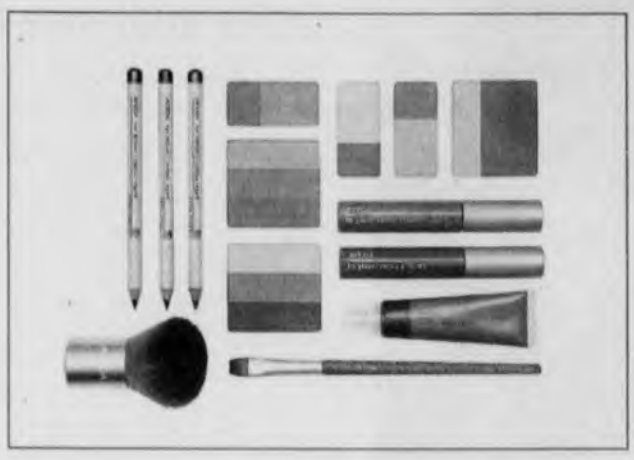
Purinton demonstrates how a three-ring release mechanism detaches the main canopy in case of a parachute malfunction during the static line class on Friday night The class was located at the Peters Recreation Complex.

Braden Erickson, Manhattan resident and skydiving student, prepares for his first static line jump with harness drills during ground training on Saturday morning at the KSUPC's hangar at Wamego Municipal Airport. Erickson said the drill helped him better understand how he should arch his body during his jump.



Hannah Blick, junior in print journalism, walks from the drop zone at Wamego Municipal Airport to the KSUPC's hanger after parachuting for the second time Sunday afternoon. Most jumpers say that they do not remember much of their first jump and Blick was no different as she said, "[The second jump] was much more vivid."

Eco-friendly hair care options becoming more prevalent online, in stores as celebrities, companies discover consumers enjoy organic beauty products

I grew up with the understanding that change is good. Without change, people would get stuck in the same dull routine every day.

The important change now, according to environmentalists, is that we need to be more aware of the environment, so over the past month I have been trying to do just that.

SARAH RASMUSSEN

I have started driving less, recycling more, and more importantly, I've started looking into eco-friendly shampoos and conditioners.

When I first started looking into "green" hair care it surprised me how many different kinds there were. I had never dreamed green hair products would already be so prevalent.

Not surprisingly, there are already organic hair care products endorsed by celebrities. Kate Hudson promotes David Babaii's new line, "David Babaii for WildAid," which launched July 2.

It has already received criticism from some skeptics who claim it still contains chemicals, but it has also garnered praise because it was only on Kate Hudson and not on animals.

My hair is naturally curly, so I blow it dry every day. I also straighten it with intense heat at least once every two weeks, so my hair is not as healthy as it could be.

After trying a few different brands, my favorite so far has been Aveda's "Be Curly." It can be found at any Aveda salon nationwide or ordered from www.aveda.com. The company also carries other shampoos and conditioners for shine, moisture and volume.

"Be Curly" has an invigorating citrus aroma that helps wake me up in the morning and it cleans off all the products I have to use on my hair to tame frizz.

Another favorite product of mine is from www.InspiredLiving.com. It is called "Miessence" shampoo and conditioner.

These products are 75 to 92 percent organic, meaning it is approved by the United States Department of Agriculture and the International Federation of Organic Agriculture Movements.

If money is a concern when shopping for hair care products, be aware that organic products are going to be more expensive when compared on an ounce-by-ounce basis. Most 8.5 ounce bottles sell for $20-$25.

Most organic companies do not stick to just producing body or hair care products. Instead, they often branch out to make-up and home fragrances as well.

This is true for both Aveda and InspiredLiving.com, as both companies carry a make-up line as well as a home fragrance and body fragrance line. The prices are a bit higher than non-organic products, but it is important to remember the products' quality.

Do not let price be the only deciding factor for beauty products.

It is an amazingly good feeling when a simple task like washing hair or putting on make-up is no longer bad for the environment.

For the adventurous type, here is one recipe to make shampoo:

- 4 ounces of castile soap with any scent is that available – plain, peppermint, eucalyptus
- ½ ounce of rosemary - stimulates the hair follicles and helps to prevent premature baldness
- ½ ounce of sage – has antioxidants and keeps things from spoiling and is antibacterial
- ½ ounce of nettles – acts as a blood purifier and blood stimulator, contains nutrients for hair growth
- ½ ounce of lavender – controls the production of sebaceous gland oil and reduces itchy and flaky scalp conditions
- 2,000 milligrams of MSM – provides organic sulfur to your scalp, which improves the health and strength of your hair; helps to drive herbal nutrient into the skin and follicles where they can do the most good.
- One empty 8 ounce plastic bottle, or any other empty shampoo or soap bottle

Mix the herbs in a mason jar with a lid. Boil 2 cups of distilled water. Add 3 heaping tablespoons of the mixed herbs into the boiling water. Pull the boiling water and herbs off the stove. Let the herb mixture sit for 30-40 minutes. Put the 2,000 milligrams of MSM into the herb mixture after 30 minutes of cooling. After 40 minutes when the MSM is melted, strain the herbal mixture into a bowl.

Pour 2 to 2 1/2 ounces of strained herbal tea into the 8 ounce plastic bottle. Now, pour the castile soap into the plastic bottle. Cap the bottle and shake to mix the ingredients.

WHAT'S THE DEAL?

Celebrity obsession only hurts U.S. news

Over the past few months, reports of celebrity abuse by paparazzi have been steadily increasing. All the stories buzzing around and the nature of Hollywood's attention-seekers makes me wonder who's to blame: the shutter bugs or the A-list stars.

Part of me wants to side with the stars because the proof is in the video when they are seemingly being chased all over Los Angeles just so paparazzi can get that one photograph which will sell for half a million dollars.

At the same time I also find myself sympathizing with the photographers because they are just trying to do their jobs.

Crazy media escapades should not be made to look like paparazzi's fault when they get phone calls telling them exactly when big stars will be where with an exact timeline of activities.

All these issues were addressed on Friday when Kathy Griffin hosted "Larry King Live." Griffin sat down with a panel of paparazzi, as well as an assortment of Hollywood stars, and asked some hard-hitting questions of both parties.

I do not know if this special was supposed to settle the ongoing battle between celebrities and entertainment media, but for me it was more of an in-depth analysis of behaviors on both sides which did not get to the bottom of anything.

The paparazzi brought up a good point when they said that the celebrities who do not like to be photographed can avoid it, but the ones who are seemingly hassled are the ones who ask to be followed.

Even Brooke Hogan admitted that she went shopping with a friend and forgot that paparazzi were usually more prevalent in the area where she went.

If she had remembered that fact, she could have avoided the press altogether.

The most perplexing thing about all of this is why we are still talking about celebrities and paparazzi.

What is a celebrity other than a person with a job to do? The same can be said for paparazzi. They are both just making a living.

Our nation's obsession with celebrities has gotten out of control. It is amazing to me that newspaper circulation is declining while magazine circulation is increasing.

As Americans, we complain about not being informed and we bash the news media, then in the next instant we take out another subscription to a tabloid magazine just to fill our minds with useless information that will probably never directly affect us.

I understand the fact that Americans live to be entertained, but there is a price to pay for our constant need for amusement.

We need to shape up and absorb more news than celebrity garbage because the latter will only take us deeper into the mess we have already created.

At this rate, our celebrity obsession could push real news to the back page.

RILEY COUNTY FAIR

Kaw Valley Rodeo tops list of crowd-pleasing activities during fair week

Area riders compete for prizes, glory, while audience enjoys spectacle, thrills

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

All eyes turned toward the gate at the north end of the stadium.

As the voice of radio announcer Dr. Lynn Phillips came over the loudspeakers, the crowd anticipated what would happen in the next eight seconds.

The cowboy settled onto his bucking bronco, raised his hand, and exploded out of the gate, desperately hanging on for his life.

A crowd of more than 300 people erupted into encouraging cheers and applause.

The entire spectacle was over in less than eight seconds, but the excitement lingered much longer.

The 33rd-annual Kaw Valley Rodeo took place last week in Manhattan's CiCo Park. Riders and ropers from Kansas, Missouri, Oklahoma, Nebraska, Texas, Iowa, Arkansas and New Mexico came to the Little Apple to compete.

Luke Holland, a member of K-State's Rodeo Club, competed in the tie-down roping and team roping events on Saturday night.

Holland, who finished second in tie-down roping, said he has been competing since he was at least eight years old.

"I have been doing this for as long as I can remember," he said. "I just love the competition aspect of the rodeo."

Fans packed Wells Arena Friday and Saturday nights to see their favorite events.

Seth Carlson, 9, of Leonardville, Kan., said his favorite event was bull riding.

"I really like coming and watching the rodeo," Carlson said. "I want to be a bull rider when I grow up, but my mom doesn't like that idea."

Riley County Idol puts local singers in spotlight

At the Riley County Fair, there is a path that goes through the fairgrounds, past the amusement rides and shops and all the food stands. It winds down to the very southwest corner of the fair, where a tent shields local entertainers from the Kansas wind.

Under the tent, contestants in the Riley County Idol Contest sang their favorite songs for fairgoers and judges Friday, Saturday and Sunday.

Contestants chose songs that were as diverse as their personalities. Almost every genre of music, from country to pop, even rock-'n'-roll, was covered.

Elizabeth McKinley, 20, Topeka resident, has competed in the Riley County Idol Contest since it began last year. She won the 20-and-over age group this year after singing country star Carrie Underwood's song "Last Name."

"I chose that song because it's a popular song and a crowd-pleaser," she said. "The best part of this contest is just getting the chance to perform on stage."

Sarah Cunnick, co-owner of Sisters of Sound and a judge for Riley County Idol, said judging the contest is a tough but enjoyable job.

"As a judge, I was looking for a person who had a good stage presence and was relaxed on stage," she said. "There were so many good performances that made it very hard to pick a winner, but it was a lot of fun."

Elizabeth McKinley, Topeka resident, sings Carrie Underwood's "Last Name," which won McKinley first place in her division at the Riley County Idol Contest Saturday night.

Tractor pull offers competition for youngest fairgoers

Marcus Wallace, Marlatt Elementary School student, concentrates as he competes in the Riley County Fair Pedal Tractor Pull Thursday evening.

In a building with a dirt- and sawdust-covered floor, children were corralled into lines according to age, and pieces of colored paper were pinned to the backs of their shirts.

As the children stood in line with wide-eyed enthusiasm, parents began to cheer them in one of the classic children's events at any fair.

Hurlburt Hall in CiCo Park served as the site of the annual Pedal Tractor Pull at the Riley County Fair.

Participants ranged in age from 4 to 12 years old. Each contestant competed against others in their own age group, and all contestants received a prize.

Peyton Horn, 7, from Linn, Kan., won hisage group for the third consecutive year.

"I really enjoy this event," Horn said. "I think it's great and I look forward to it every year."

Because he won his age division, Horn will travel to the Kansas State Fair in Hutchinson, Kan., to compete in the state-level tractor pull competition.

"Last year I made it all the way to nationals," Horn said. "I really hope I make it back there again this year."

Cindy Casper, Riley County Fair board member, said the tractor pull was her favorite part of the fair.

"I wouldn't want to work anywhere else," Casper said. "The best part is seeing all the kids smiling and having fun."

Summer experiences provide lifetime lessons

SALENA STRATE

That's a wrap on my final steps of achieving my dream to be the Editor in Chief of a collegiate publication. When I think back to the long hours of missing football games and scrambling to make late-night deadlines, I realize it was all worth it.

The other day, I was interviewing for my next job, and the interviewer asked me what I would change about my college experience if I could change anything. This question caught me slightly off-guard because I started at Student Publications from day one at K-State and never looked back.

Now, as I enter my senior year, I have the opportunity to reminisce about my accomplishments. So, I told the interviewee that there is nothing I would want to change about my experience – Student Publications has given me everything.

For readers not living in Manhattan this summer, you have missed a season full of news. The Collegian staff kept busy covering stories like President Jon Wefald's retirement, the Manhattan tornado and Gov. Kathleen Sebelius' vice-presidental chances. You have also missed our series, "Day in the Life," which focused on common and not-so-common summer experiences. For everyone in, or out, of town, I hope you have enjoyed our Web site's exciting redesign with more videos and multimedia coverage.

In regards to how much we have accomplished, I was allowed to work with the best staff members possible. From my amazing photographers who captured the best shots, to Hannah, my center and driving force, everyone in the newsroom worked hard to tell all our stories and complete our goals.

If anyone is thinking about working for the Collegian, I would highly recommend it. The Collegian can teach you about hard work, deadlines and working with people. The newspaper has taught me so many lessons that it is hard not to look back at how much I have grown.

So, thank you for reading the Collegian, and look for more from this ever-changing, dynamic student newspaper.

K-STATE RESEARCH

Associate dean named interim director of BRI

By Aubree Casper
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Beth Montelone joined K-State as a biology professor in 1988, and 20 years later, she has become director of one of the most cutting-edge research facilities on campus.

BETH MONTELONE

Montelone, associate dean of the College of Arts and Sciences, was named interim director of the Biosecurity Research Institute by Ron Trewyn, vice president for research, on Friday.

The New York native served as associate director of the Division of Biology and associate director of the Terry C. Johnson Center for Basic Cancer Research from 2002 to 2004 before assuming her current role as associate dean of Arts and Sciences, according to a K-State press release.

Montelone's expertise covers many areas including genetics, molecular genetics, molecular biology and science outreach.

As co-principal investigator of a $3.5 million, five-year National Science Foundation grant, Montelone is working to promote and increase the number of women teaching in the fields of science and engineering.

Additional research and outreach projects line Montelone's resume as she works towards increasing an interest in the sciences through numerous programs like Women in Engineering and Girls Researching Our World.

Her experience as a microbiologist and molecular biologist, as well as chairperson of the Institutional Biosafety Committee, are roles Montelone said helped prepare for her new position.

Montelone said her goals as interim director of a high-profile research center include getting research projects established in the BRI building and encouraging K-State faculty to develop projects and collaborations that will make use of the building's capabilities.

As interim director, Montelone has been also distinguished with an endowed professorship as Peine professor of biosecurity.

As K-State continues to make its bid for the National Bio and Agro-defense Facility, the university's first national-level research facility will spend more time in the spotlight.

Preparing for this scrutiny, Montelone said, "The BRI was a bold investment for K-State that has probably been partly responsible for placing Manhattan on the list of NBAF finalists. It is very exciting to be able to have a leadership role in this facility."

CAMPUS | Trees replanted

About 32 buildings have been washed so far, and the rest will be done before school starts. Wefald said he has been impressed by the results.

"[The buildings] are just illuminated," he said.

As repairs continue and the university receives proposals for work, Shubert said the initial estimate of $20 million in damages has not changed yet. To help with those costs, the KSU Foundation established the K-State Tornado Relief Fund.

Julie Lea, vice president of communications for the Foundation, said the fund has received 550 gifts for a total of $280,372. Of that amount, $50,000 came from ConocoPhillips and $150,000 came from the Dane G. Hansen Foundation. Lea said both organizations are frequent contributors to K-State scholarship funds.

On the day after the storm hit, Lea said the Foundation sent an e-mail to 63,000 friends and donors in its database. In the first four days of its existence, individual donations to the fund totaled $50,000, with the remaining $30,000 coming in the following month.

"It's really been an inspiring response," Lea said. "$80,00 from individuals – that's enough to actually make a difference."

Inspiration is just the feeling Wefald said he hopes students experience when they return to campus next month.

"Except for when these buildings were built, I would guess the campus has never been cleaner," he said. "I think people will be shocked when they come back, look around and say, 'What tornado?'"

RECRUITMENT | Changes will make week more efficient, convenient through the process money, Eagleburger said.

The fee to register for recruitment was lowered from $332 to $225, he said.

By eliminating one day from the process, Eagleburger said existing members are given the chance to make more money by giving them more time with summer jobs and internships.

He also said the chapter houses will not have to begin operating until later, which will also save money.

"The changes being made this year are going to allow women to spend more time with family and jobs, making the commitment to come to K-State not as much of a financial challenge," said Scott Jones, director of Greek Affairs.

"The short week allows more summer time for students, and provides more support to them during the decision-making process, which will improve the quality of the entire recruitment process. These changes are making recruitment more accessible to a larger number of women because of the changes in the cost and timeline structure of the week."

There are also changes being made to the housing of women going through recruitment, Eagleburger said. In the past, participants stayed in Marlatt and Goodnow Halls and ate in different dining complexes.

This year, all students going through recruitment will eat at Derby Dining Complex, he said.

Also in the past, women going through recruitment had to drive themselves to different houses during the week.

This year, students have been given the opportunity to use university vehicles to get around, Eagleburger said.

Some sorority members said they think the changes will dramatically improve the week's process.

"I think the shorter week of recruitment will make things less stressful for the girls," said Whitney Francis, junior in mass communications and member of Delta Delta Delta sorority. "It's a rough week that seems to drag on, so one less day will help."

NBAF | 2 public sessions planned on the environmental influence of each aspect of constructing and operating such a facility in Manhattan, said Cheryl May, assistant vice president of media relations and marketing.

May also said the series will be conducted during two separate sessions, which will take place from 12:30 to 4:30 p.m. and from 6 to 10 p.m. Both sessions are open to the public and community members who want to voice their opinions on the NBAF's potential effect on Manhattan's environment. May said those wanting to participate in one of the two meetings can sign up starting at 12:30 p.m. and 6 p.m., respectively, prior to each session on a first-come, first-serve basis.

The sessions will include one hour to sign up to speak and review information about the NBAF. There will also be a one-hour explanation of the NBAF's Environmental Impact Statement, followed by the two-hour comment period, which will start at either 2:30 p.m. or 8 p.m.

According to the press release, many K-State leaders will be available for information, and Sebelius is expected to speak during the 2:30-4:30 p.m. session.

The five other candidate cities for the NBAF include Flora, Miss., San Antonio, Texas, Butner, N.C., Plum Island, N.Y., and Athens, Ga., according to the Department of Homeland Security's Web site.

Information and comments presented at the sessions on Thursday will be used by the Department of Homeland Security to compile an NBAF Environmental Impact Statement on the effects the facility might have in the Manhattan community.
